

From the Library of Professor Samuel Miller in Memory of Judge Samuel Miller Breckinridge Presented by Samuel Miller Breckinridge Long to the Library of Princeton Theological Seminary

500
517.1
v.1

S E R M O N S

O N T H E

H E A R T:

I N T W O V O L U M E S.

✓ B Y

J O H N J A M I E S O N, M. A.

M I N I S T E R O F T H E G O S P E L, F O R F A R.

V O L. I:

As in water face answereth to face : so the heart of man to man.

PROV. xxvii. 19.

E D I N B U R G H :

P R I N T E D B Y N E I L L A N D C O M P A N Y ;

S O L D b y C. D I L L Y ; J. M A T T H E W S ; C. E L L I O T, a n d T. K A Y ; B E L L A M Y
a n d R O B A R T S ; L o n d o n ; M. G R A Y, C. E L L I O T, a n d W. L A I N G, E d i n b u r g h ; J. D U N C A N, a n d R. F A R I E, G l a s g o w.

M, D C C, L X X X I X.

ENTERED IN STATIONERS HALL.

A D V E R T I S E M E N T.

SOME, it may be feared, from the very title of this Work, may condemn it without a trial. Men are naturally disposed to think well of their own hearts, to boast of their goodness, and to palliate even the worst actions by claiming integrity of design; as if all their transgressions were owing to the surprize of temptation, some pitiable weakness, or unaccountable fatality. So powerful is the principle of self-love, especially with respect to the heart, that he who dares to arraign it, is in danger of being viewed by the bulk of mankind as an enemy to human nature. Those who extol the powers of man in his fallen state, who either deny or draw a veil over the fatal effects of the first transgression, are supposed to discover the goodness of their own hearts, and their love to others; nay, to represent their beneficent Creator in a more amiable point of view, than that in which he appears as the Redeemer of lost man. Many are so prepossessed by these notions, that they will not even attempt to exercise their boasted reason in a fair investigation of truth. The cry of "Fanaticism" and "Enthusiasm," is deemed a sufficient reply to all that can be offered on the other side. But men of reason ought to blush at this conduct. It is not the manner of their law to condemn any man without hearing him. Both parties profess to adhere to one supreme standard, how much soever they may vary as to the mode of interpretation: and to this we are willing to refer the decision of the cause. To the Law, and to the Testimony, if we speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in us.

The design of the proposed Work is candidly to represent the Heart of Man, as far as possible, according to the just and striking likeness exhibited on the table of Divine Revelation. If the picture given shall, on a fair comparison with the great original, be found unjust, then let it be condemned. If otherwise, let every man who views it, remember that it is his own. For, as in water face answereth to face, so the heart of man to man. In this Work it hath been the Author's aim to treat the subject all along in a practical manner, and to appeal for the truth of what is asserted, not only to the testimony of Scripture, but to man's inward feelings. Many of the proofs of natural depravity, here exhibited, are so obvious, that even carnal men cannot deny them without giving the lie to their own consciousness and experience. They must, therefore, either bring forward some cause equally adequate to the production of effects so various and astonishing, and at least equally agreeable able to the scriptural account ; or stand convicted and condemned by their own conscience. For Example must be acknowledged, even by themselves, entirely insufficient ; as, if they be not singularly successful in blinding their minds, they cannot but be sensible of many secret workings of iniquity in their hearts, the patterns of which they have never received from others ; because they are no less secret in them.

To many it may appear that a great deal too much is offered on one general head. But it hath been a principal object to hold up the Heart of Man in various points of light, and at the same time to avoid repetition as far as the nature of the subject will allow. And to every one who is but a little acquainted with his own Heart, after all it will appear that the one half hath not been told. For who can know it ? It must also be remembered, that the whole of Divine Revelation naturally divides itself into two great branches ; — the description of man's Ruin by the breach of the first covenant, and that of his Restoration by the second. If the former be not really believed and well understood, one can neither have a genuine faith, nor a just apprehension of the latter. The doctrine of human depravity is a key indispensably necessary for unlocking the precious treasures of the Word. While this depravity itself, as enthroned in the heart, is the great cause of the denial and contempt of the genuine doctrine of salvation in its contrivance, purchase and application ; ignorance of the reality or extent of the disease may be viewed as next in energy, in producing rejection of the remedy. For they that be whole need not a physician. Men may have a sort of doctrinal notion of the corruption of nature, which hath no influence on their hearts. Thence they receive other doctrines, diametrically opposite ; and deny those which are inseparably connected with this. Whatever be their profession, they do not believe it with the heart ; else they would not be so eager to build up with the one hand, what they pull down with the other ; or to burn incense to the drag of corrupt nature, as an atonement for the dishonour done to it, in charging it with corruption ; by framing such a system of human ability, in spiritual respects, as could only be true if the heart were entirely pure. But disbelief or ignorance of this doctrine, is, indeed, the copious fountain of almost every error that hath defiled the Church of Christ.

These considerations are in themselves so important, as in some degree to entitle a work on this subject to a serious and attentive perusal by those into whose hands it may fall. Whatever the Author might plead from the solicitations of some who heard these discourses, and whose opinion he highly respects ; or from any usefulness ascribed to them by others, who, he trusts, are now in that place where there is no occasion for the

the feeble light of a candle; the considerations above-mentioned had far more weight in determining him to submit them to the eye of the Public. A variety of discourses might have been presented, which would have been far less obnoxious to the generality of readers, and less irritating to the corruption of any. But there seemed to be more occasion for something on this subject, than on the peculiar doctrines of the Gospel; as there are innumerable discourses on the latter, unspeakably superior to any thing that the Author could offer, already in the hands of the Public; while few writers have enlarged on the former. The generality of those also who have treated this subject, have done so, perhaps rather too much for the bulk of readers, in an abstract and systematical manner. As all these Sermons, except one or two, were delivered in an ordinary course of preaching; this plan was adopted, only in consequence of finding little fruit from the former. Evidences brought from experience and facts, especially when supported by the authority of Scripture, are, as means, more likely to be useful to the greatest part of mankind, than abstract reasoning; how necessary soever this be, at times, in disputing with the wise of this world: although neither can have any saving effect, without the gracious operation of the holy Spirit. A great part of Scripture, indeed, seems to be designed for the very purpose of proving the depravation of our nature, in the manner mentioned. It appears to be a primary intention of the Spirit of inspiration, to strike the imagination, conscience and affections of man, with a progressive display of human wickedness, from the very entrance of sin; and thus to demonstrate, in the most cogent manner, its abominable nature, universal extent, and fatal effects: as many of the judgments there recorded, were originally meant to bring down this doctrine, in some sort, to the very level of the senses.

The Author is sensible that there are innumerable defects in this Work, both as to matter and style. With respect to the latter, it hath been his principal aim to render himself intelligible to every reader. It is feared, that few will have patience to peruse it, to whom this would be the leading objection. Were the Public entertained with romantic ideas of life, a description of feelings which were never realized, or a history of the heart from characters that never had an existence, save in the warm imaginations of writers; far more attention might be expected. The attempt might be applauded, as throwing light on the important study of Man. But can a portrait of the Heart be more unworthy of attention, because it is originally drawn by the finger of God? Can characters afford no instruction or entertainment, merely because they are real? Or, is the history of Human Nature less valuable, because it does not derive its authorities from the dreams of a glowing fancy, or from the peculiar manners of one country; but from the annals of the Church, for near four thousand years, and from a Book, which, with the greatest minuteness and fidelity, describes the manners of men, in characters that apply to every nation, and to every age? Is a description of the diseases that infect and ravage the heart, the worse that it is accurate, faithful and unerring? Or, is it the less worthy of our regard, that it does not resemble those of human physicians, with respect to the uncertainty of cure, or the impropriety of applications; but is connected with the prescription of a Remedy, infinite in value, unfailing in efficacy, and freely offered to all? Whatever mistakes the Author may be chargeable with; he is conscious, that, to the utmost of his power, he hath endeavoured to derive the description here given of the heart, from the infallible testimony of that God, who searcheth all hearts, and understandeth all the imaginations of the thoughts; without either wishing to exaggerate the account, or daring to pervert or conceal any thing that seemed to bear the awful impress of Divine authority.
it

Various modes of expression, here used, may appear antiquated, and unsuitable to the refined taste of this age. But they will bear the greater resemblance to the sentiments they convey. Many, in our time, have laid aside such terms as were formerly used on religious subjects; because, as they pretend, they have been prostituted by some, as the engines of Hypocrisy or Enthusiasm. But it is certainly safest to speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the holy Ghost teacheth. For the words of the Lord are pure words; as silver tried in a furnace of earth, purified seven times: while we know that, in every age, the introduction of new terms hath either prepared the way, or been meant as a covert to error. Those, who are not ashamed of old doctrines, need not be ashamed of old expressions, or go back to the schools of heathenism to borrow new ones. While they still retain the sacred stamp of inspiration, there is no more reason for rejecting them, because they may have been sometimes abused, than for wishing for a new Bible, because every heretic, however much he despises or tortures its language, palms his errors on the one we have.

It is, and through grace, will be the earnest desire and prayer of the Author, that He, who hath the hearts of all in his hand, may bless this Work as a mean of acquainting some with their own Hearts, who yet walk in darkness, and know not at what they stumble; and of increasing this important knowledge in others, in whom the day of grace hath already dawned.

C O N T E N T S

OF THE FIRST VOLUME.

	Page
SER. I. On the Evil of Sin, - - -	1
Jer. ii. 19. Know therefore and see, that it is an evil thing and bitter, that thou hast forsaken the Lord thy God.
SER. II. On the Bitterness of Sin, - - -	16
Jer. ii. 19.— Know therefore and see, that it is an evil thing and bitter, that thou hast forsaken the Lord thy God.
SER. III. On the Plague of the Heart, - - -	49
I Kings, viii. 38.— Who shall know every man the plague of his own heart.—
SER. IV. On knowing the Plague of the Heart, - - -	70
I Kings, viii. 38.— Who shall know every man the plague of his own heart.—
SER. V. On the Necessity of Knowing the Plague of the Heart, - - -	88
I Kings, viii. 38.— Who shall know every man the plague of his own heart.—
SER. VI. The same subject continued, - - -	107
SER. VII. On Heart-knowledge as connected with National Reformation and Deliverance, - - -	125
I Kings, viii. 38.— Who shall know every man the plague of his own heart.—
SER. VIII. On the Atheism of the Heart, - - -	154
Psal. xiv. 1. The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God.
SER. IX. On the Evidences of Heart-Atheism, - - -	166
Psal. xiv. 1. The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God.
SER. X. On the Consequences of the Atheism of the Heart, - - -	182
Psal. xiv. 1. The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God.
SER. XI. On the Deceitfulness of the Heart, - - -	201
Jer. xvii. 9. The heart is deceitful above all things.
SER. XII. On the Deceitfulness of the Heart, with regard to the Commission of Sin, - - -	220
Psal. xxxvi. 2. He flattereth himself in his own eyes, until his iniquities be found to be hateful.
SER. XIII. The same subject continued, - - -	235
	SER.

	Page
SER. XIV. On the Deceitfulness of the Heart, in stifling Convictions, - -	251
Jer. viii. 5. They hold fast deceit, they refuse to return.
SER. XV. On the Deceitfulness of the Heart, in embracing false grounds of Confidence, -	276
Isa. xlv. 20. He feedeth of ashes; a deceived heart hath turned him aside, that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say, Is there not a lie in my right hand?
SER. XVI. The same subject continued, -	292
SER. XVII. The same subject continued, -	310
SER. XVIII. On the Deceitfulness of the Heart, with respect to the Performance of Duty, -	326
Pfal. lxxviii. 56, 57.— And kept not his testimonies; but turned back, and dealt unfaithfully, like their fathers: they were turned aside like a deceitful bow.
SER. XIX. On the Deceitfulness of the Heart, with respect to the Omission of Duty, - -	353
Pfal. lxxviii. 56, 57.— And kept not his testimonies; but turned back, and dealt unfaithfully, like their fathers: they were turned aside like a deceitful bow.
SER. XX. On the Deceitfulness of the Heart, as influencing the Conduct in Life, - -	372
Jam. i. 22. But be ye doers of the word, and not bearers only, deceiving your own selves.
SER. XXI. On the Deceitfulness of the Heart, in the Abuse of Prosperity, - -	393
Jer. xlix. 16. Thy terriblest hath deceived thee, and the pride of thine heart.
SER. XXII. On the Deceitfulness of the Heart, with respect to Adversity, - -	410
Isa. lvii. 17. I smote him; I hid me, and was wroth, and he went on frowardly in the way of his heart.
SER. XXIII. On the Deceitfulness of the Heart, in disregarding Providential Dispensations in general, -	430
Pfal. lxxviii. 7. 8.— And not forget the works of God;—and might not be as their fathers; a generation that set not their heart aright, and whose spirit was not stedfast with God.
SER. XXIV. The same subject continued, -	451

S E R M O N I.

O N T H E E V I L O F S I N.

JER. ii. 19.

Know therefore and see, that it is an evil thing and bitter, that thou hast forsaken the Lord thy God.

SALVATION by Christ is the sum and substance of the holy Scriptures. In this, as their centre, all the lines of divine revelation meet. To this, all the histories and prophecies, types and ceremonies, precepts, promises and exhortations, contained in the word, either immediately or ultimately relate. They all point out JESUS as the end of the law for righteousness. But as sinners must know their disease, before they can see the necessity of improving the remedy, there are many calls, commands and expostulations addressed to them, declaring the evil and danger of sin. These may be thought unnecessary, because every man has some notion of his being a sinner; intimations of which we have even among the most unenlightened nations. But although this is a truth that every man pretends to believe, there are few who believe it in a right manner. So unjust, partial and unaffecting are the apprehensions, which the generality entertain of sin, that it plainly appears they know not what it is. They reckon deliverance from it so easy a matter, as to despise the salvation purchased by Christ at such infinite expence, as if it were a thing of naught. But, to declare the real nature of sin, the necessity of a saving apprehension of it, the importance of the work of redemption, and to leave every hearer of the gospel without excuse, the Lord addresses himself in this manner to sinners, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear: Know therefore and see, that it is an evil thing and bitter, that thou hast forsaken the Lord thy God.

WE learn from the connection, that the Lord, by the Prophet, is here immediately pleading with his ancient people, as to that sin with which they were eminently chargeable, the worship of false gods. But we may justly understand his language, as containing a description of the nature of sin, extensively considered. For the idea conveyed by this expression, Thou hast forsaken the Lord, and the characters of evil and bitter, are applicable to sin in general. The words immediately in view are introduced with a sentence, the truth of which is found by every sinner, sooner or later: Thine own wickedness shall correct thee, and thy backslidings shall reprove thee. Was this awful denunciation accomplished by God with regard to his ancient people, when, in his providence, their attachment to idolatry proved the source of their national correction in the Babylonish captivity? And is it not as really verified, either in a temporal or spiritual respect, in the experience of every sinner who goes on in his trespasses? Sin often carries its own punishment along with it. Thus, the wickedness of the sinner corrects him, when he feels the dreadful stings of conscience on account of sin, that sometimes attend the very perpetration of it, and which, unless the conscience be awfully feared, are its inevitable consequences. These stings are often so keen, that all the pleasures and blandishments of life cannot assuage the pain, or remove the poison. Nay, these very pleasures are embittered in the enjoyment; and life itself, how pleasing soever in a natural point of view, becomes a torment. The wickedness of the sinner corrects him, when it not only wounds the peace of his mind, but so impairs his health, and spirits, and worldly circumstances, that himself and every thing around him are constant memorials of his extreme folly. But alas!

to the impenitent sinner, this correction is severest in the end, compared with which, all his former sufferings are only the beginning of sorrows.

In opening these words, we propose,

- I. To make some introductory observations ;
- II. To speak of the evil of sin ;
- III. To consider its bitterness ;
- IV. To show by what proofs sinners may know and see, that it is evil and bitter.

It is first proposed to offer a few observations.

I. IT may be observed, that men in general think lightly of sin. They consider it rather as a failure or infirmity of nature, than as positive transgression, guilt or vileness. Nay, some are so abandoned as to account sin no evil at all ; at least, they pretend to do so. Therefore, it is said, that *fools make a mock of sin. When they read or hear of its evil and wickedness, they ridicule all such representations. They laugh at its nature and consequences. Some even go so far as to glory in their iniquity. The more that the drunkard debases himself below the brute-creation, the more he boasts. The debauchee triumphs, not only in the frequency of his abominable prostitution, but in his success in seducing others to iniquity. The profane sinner exults in the fruitfulness of his invention, in the language of blasphemy. These are the persons whom the Spirit of God describes as placing their glory in their shame †, and declaring their sin as Sodom ‡. Men will often confess they are sinners, and pretend to pray for the pardon of sin ; when, perhaps, they have not one affecting thought with respect to its evil, and are nowise serious in their pretended prayers. They will patiently hear ministers preach against sin, and enlarge on its evil ; but give themselves no further trouble about

* Prov. xiv. 9.

† Phil. iii. 19.

‡ Isai. iii. 9.

about it : because they consider it just as their business to speak evil of sin ; as if the Holy One had not declared that HE cannot look upon it.

2. THE great reason why men think so lightly of sin is, that they think lightly of God. Our judgment of any thing is always in proportion to our esteem or disesteem of its opposite. God and sin are two contraries ; and we will unavoidably form our estimate of sin, according to that which we form of essential holiness. Many profess to believe the being of God, but are destitute of any concern for his glory. They acknowledge their dependence on him : yet they act as if they were unaccountable. They are regardless of sin, because they have no fear of God. Therefore, it is added in the verse,—and that my fear is not in thee, saith the Lord of Hosts.

3. THERE is an infinite evil in sin. This may appear impossible, because man, its subject, is a finite being. But although viewed in man, or in any creature as its subject, it can be only finite ; with respect to God, the object against whom it is directed, it is infinitely evil : for it is an affront to his infinite perfections. Men themselves judge of the evil of crimes, not so much by the person who commits them, as by the object against whom they are committed ; and according to the station or dignity of the injured party, they are viewed as greater or less. Thus, that which is only felony, when affecting a fellow-subject, becomes high treason, when committed against the Sovereign. In forming an estimate of the evil of sin, we are not so much to judge of it by the relation it bears to ourselves, or to society, as by that which it bears to the great God, who is principally offended. The evil of sin, as committed against him, appears so enhanced, that notwithstanding its fatal effects with regard to ourselves or others, we may speak of every transgression in the language of David in his penitential psalm : Against thee, thee only have I sinned, and done this evil in thy sight *. Every sin strikes against God, as peculiarly cularly and directly, as if no other were either affected or offended by it, or even privy to the commission. Had there not been an infinite evil in sin objectively considered, it would not have required infinite satisfaction. It was not possible that the blood of bulls and goats could take away sin. It indeed required the shedding of blood: but this blood must be of infinite value. That of the sinner himself could not suffice. Therefore God must purchase the Church with his own blood *. For without this there could have been no salvation. It was necessary that the ransom should be infinitely precious;—not because of the multitude of sinners to be redeemed; for they, being finite, could never, by reason of their number, require infinite satisfaction:—not merely because of the multitude of sins from which they were to be redeemed, which, in a certain sense, as exceeding all human calculation, may be called infinite †; for these were all known to him, and he could have exacted the ransom, without exceeding in the least:—but by reason of the evil of sin, which required that infinite satisfaction should be given to Divine Justice. This is the great reason why the sufferings of hell are eternal. For as the sinner, on account of his finite nature, cannot give that infinite satisfaction which the justice of God demands, or, in other words, sustain the whole of divine wrath at once, it is necessary that it be continued for ever, that what he cannot sustain in its full extent, may be measured out in endless duration. This, we say, is the great reason, for it is not the only one. Their continuance in sin would, of itself, subject them to continuance in suffering.

* Psal. li. 4.

4. All sin has an infinite evil in it. As it hath been proved, that this is an attribute of sin in general, as being committed against a God of infinite perfection; it must be ascribed to every sin. For the evil of its nature arising, not from that degree of guilt which belongs to any particular transgression, or the peculiar atrocity attending it, but from its opposition to the nature nature of God, as will be more fully declared afterwards; every sin must partake of this evil nature. Some sins indeed are more aggravated, and attended with more atrocious circumstances than others. But it will not thence follow, that some sins are infinitely evil, and that others are not. Is it objected, “ That if “ this be a property essential to sin, no one offence “ can be greater than another, that the least trans“ gression is, in a comparative point of view, as hei“ nous as the greatest, because, that which is infinite “ admitting of no degrees, it cannot be said that one “ sin is less, and another more infinitely evil, as this “ would be a denial of the infinite evil of sin altoge“ ther?” But although every sin be infinitely evil, it must be remembered, that it is only so objectively, as terminating on God, and not subjectively, as committed by the creature. Were it asserted, which could not be done without the greatest absurdity, that all sin is infinitely evil in the strict and proper sense of the expression, in reference not only to its object, but to its subject: even then it would not follow, that there were no difference in the acts of sin. Thus in the Divine Nature, which, in the full and proper sense of the word, is the only Infinite, although infinitude necessarily belongs to all its perfections, yet there is a very great difference with respect to the displays and effects of these. Infinite wisdom, power and goodness are displayed in the works of creation and providence; but all these are displayed in a more striking manner in the work of redemption. The exertions are all infinite, and so admit of no degrees. But the expressions and effects are different. There is no more infinite wisdom, power, or goodness, put forth in any one work, in which these perfections are exerted, than in another; but there is a more illustrious manifestation of these in some works than in others.

* Acts xx. 28.

† Job xxii. 5.

THEREFORE, we must distinguish between the nature and acts of sin. Although every sin is infinitely evil, yet in some particular acts, there is a greater display of this evil than in others. This is agreeable to

to the doctrine of our catechisms. "Some sins in themselves, and by reason of several aggravations, are more heinous in the sight of God than others *." Some sins in themselves are so, as being more immediately opposed to the Divine Being, and containing a greater degree of virulence and enmity against his glorious perfections, as being committed against the first, rather than the second table of his holy law. Atheism and blasphemy are greater sins than theft or covetousness. It is an higher offence against God, to murder our neighbour, than to hurt his reputation only. Thus we read of some abominations greater than others †; of greater sin ‡; of sin which is unto death; and sin which is not unto death §. Some sins are also more heinous than others, because of their aggravations. Sin derives its aggravations "from the persons offending; from the parties offended; from the nature and qualities of the offence; and from the circumstances of time and place."—Therefore, in urging this consideration, we do not mean to insinuate, that a man, because he is already a sinner, may indulge himself in the commission of the greatest sins, thinking that he can become no worse; for we have seen, that there are different degrees in the evil, and, therefore, in the guilt and pollution of sin. But we urge it, to warn sinners of the folly of being unconcerned about what they call little sins, because these same little sins will as certainly insure them of eternal punishment, if they continue under the guilt of them, as the greatest. Can any sin be little, which offends and injures a God of infinite majesty and perfection? Can any sin be little, which has so much guilt as to expose the subject of it to everlasting condemnation? The guilt of one sin, yea the guilt of the least sin, comparatively viewed, as really exposes to eternal wrath, as that of the greatest, or of all our sins accumulated. The least sin implies in it ingratitude, unbelief, rebellion, and atheism. And what more

* Larger Cat. q. 150.

† Ezek. viii. 6. 13. 15.

‡ John xix. 11.

§ 1 Joha v. 16.

more can be said of the greatest, save that these ingredients exist in a greater degree; as arising from the means enjoyed, the mercies received, and its immediate tendency, which subject the transgressor to an higher degree of guilt, deformity and pollution? The law saith; Cursed is every one that continueth not in ALL things, which are written in the book of the law to do them *. Christ, who came not to destroy the law, but to fulfil, further declares; Whosoever shall break ONE of these LEAST commandments,—shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven †. It was

II. Proposed to speak of the evil of Sin.

Sin is said to be an evil thing,—

I. BECAUSE it is contrary to the nature of God. This is the supreme standard of truth and righteousness. Every thing is good, just as it is like God, or evil, as it is unlike him. There can be no good in the world, but that which is a resemblance of his nature, and an emanation from himself; and disconformity to him is that which alone constitutes the essence of evil. Now, sin being unlike God, must, of necessity, be evil. Men may talk as they will of moral rectitude, and the fitness of things. But these are terms without meaning, unless we understand them as relating to the perfections of the Divine Nature; for there can be no notion of rectitude, fitness, or propriety, abstracted from the nature of God. This is the standard of right and wrong which is in every man's breast. How unjust and deficient soever the apprehensions he may entertain of these, through his own disconformity to God, he naturally reduces all his ideas to this standard, and when attempting to deviate from it, he acts in opposition to the dictates of conscience, which knows no other. It is impossible it can know any other: for this is the test of right and wrong, the umpire and witness that God hath implanted within us, and however weak and imperfect its representations, they still refer to

* Gal. iii. 10.

† Mat. v. 19

to the nature of God; however hardened and seared the conscience itself, as it can never be altogether erased, if it has any motions at all, they are still directed to this quarter. Even Heathens themselves, amidst all their ignorance and corruption of the means which they enjoyed, had some remaining sense of the Divine Nature, as the only standard of truth or moral rectitude. Their laborious, although unsuccessful, investigations into the origin of moral evil, were a demonstrative evidence of this. For notwithstanding the gross and impious representations that the Poets gave of their Deities, their Philosophers, knowing, from the dictates of conscience, that the Divine Nature must be infinitely removed from sin, were extremely at a loss to account for its entrance into the world. Being destitute of Revelation, and having all their traditions so corrupted, that they could learn nothing certain from them; they adopted innumerable theories for explaining this undeniable fact, which however false and fruitless, plainly discovered their sense of the nature of God as the standard of truth, and their sense of sin as being his opposite. To this purpose speaks the Apostle: For when the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law; these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves: which show the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the meanwhile accusing, or else excusing one another *.

2. BECAUSE it is contrary to his holy law. This is the exact transcript of his nature. He hath delineated his own likeness in the commands and threatenings of the law. These are especially declarations of his holiness and justice, those perfections by which he cannot but hate sin, and cannot but punish it. He hath manifested great kindness to man, by revealing his will in the written word; because man discovers by this means what God requires, and what he forbids. It is a beacon constantly deterring him from sin, and prompting him to duty. We are not called to form our apprehensions of these from the nature of God, abstractly and essentially considered, but from that striking representation of it impressed on his law; because otherwise we can have no just apprehension of them. Now, the strict and proper idea of sin is, “the want of conformity to, or transgression of the law of God.” We are not to consider these as two distinct ingredients in sin; for they cannot be viewed separately. Wherever there is a want of conformity to the law, there must be a transgression of it: for sin is the transgression of the law; John iii. 4. There may be such a transgression, where no act of sin is openly committed, as in that which is secret; nay, where there is no actual sin chargeable, as in children who are transgressors from the womb. But there can be no want of conformity to the law, that does not immediately and necessarily imply transgression. For this very want is a disposition of the mind directly opposing the law, which requires holiness in heart and nature, as well as in life. Sin can never be viewed as a bare defect; for wherever there is this want of conformity, it is inseparably attended by depravity, and a principle of opposition. This is the very meaning of the word used by the Apostle John, which is rendered transgression of the law. It means unlawfulness, such a deviation from the law as implies contrariety to it. It signifies a removal from that integrity which the law requires, not only the want of original righteousness, but a propensity to all sin; yea, it is applied to the commission of the greatest sins, as in Matth. vii. 23. Depart from me, ye workers of iniquity. So also Rom. vi. 19. Ye have yielded your members servants to uncleanness, and to iniquity, unto iniquity. The formal idea of sin is said to consist in this, of its being a transgression of the law, because *where no law is, there is no transgression. This notion of sin is usually illustrated by the situation of a person under a bodily disease, who, not only labours under the want of a proper temperament of humours, but hath a positive disorder disorder among them. So sin, which is a moral disease, a malady of the soul, not only implies a want of proper conformity to the law, but a real opposition to it. But it ought to be observed, that men are chargeable with sin, even when destitute of the written word; because they have the remains of the law upon their hearts.

* Rom. ii. 14, 15.

* Rom. iv. 15.

3. IT is an attempt against the moral government of God in the world. This is the necessary result of its being a transgression of the law. For God, as the Creator of the universe, hath an undoubted right to act as its Supreme Ruler; and the way in which he governs his intelligent subjects is by a law, suited to the nature he hath given them. Now, when this law is broken, God's moral government is denied and rejected. The sinner thus does all in his power to dethrone God. Every sin is a denial of all the Divine perfections. Therefore is sin so often described in the holy Scripture as rebellion. *I have nourished and brought up children; and they have rebelled against me. This is a rebellious people, lying children, that will not bear the law of the Lord†. They rebelled and vexed his holy Spirit‡. In the same manner speaks the Prophet Daniel in his confession of sins: We have sinned and committed iniquity, and have done wickedly, and have rebelled by departing from thy precepts, and from thy judgments§. Thus a departure from God's precepts is accounted rebellion by God himself, and by all who have a due sense of the evil of sin.

4. SIN appears to be evil, because it is abominable to God. This is the unavoidable consequence of its opposition to his nature, law, and moral government. Being contrary to his nature, it must also be the object of his abhorrence. Sin is the very reverse of God's holiness, and therefore he must hate it. For God, being infinitely and absolutely perfect, must be the object of his own love; and therefore, sin being contrary to his own perfection, must be the object of his hatred.

* Isa. i. 2.

† Isa. xxx. 9.

‡ Isa. lxiii. 10.

§ Dan. ix. 5.

hatred. Could God cease to hate sin, he would cease to be God; for then he would cease to love himself, he would cease to be holy. But, in the word, he constantly declares his unchangeable hatred of sin. It is called that abominable thing which God hateth; Jer. xliv. 4. Ob! do not this abominable thing that I hate. Sin is not here particularly mentioned; but it is described much more emphatically. It is called the abominable thing. It is thus described by way of eminence, as denoting that it is abominable in such a sense, as to admit of no parallel; so very abominable, that although the thing itself be not specified, there is no danger of any thing else in the world being mistaken for it. Yea, it is that abominable thing that God hates. The hateful-ness of sin is thus doubly expressed. It is represented as abominable in its nature, and abominable to God. It is so abominable, that nothing else in the universe is the object of Divine hatred, or nothing else but on account of sin. As if it were not enough, that sin is called the abominable thing, and that which God hates; it is elsewhere spoken of as that which his soul hateth. Psal. xi. 5. Him that loveth violence his soul hateth. God speaks of his soul after the manner of man; not as if he had a soul, like man; but as the soul of man is that by which he wills and acts, so also God hath in himself a faculty of willing and acting; but of so superlative a nature, that it is the fountain of all being, willing and acting to his creatures. The same word is sometimes rendered his soul, and at other times his life. When his soul is said to hate sin or wickedness; the meaning therefore is, that he hath the most perfect abhorrence of it; that he hates it absolutely and essentially; that he cannot but hate it; that it is as necessary for him to hate it, as it is for him to live as the self-existent God; that he hates it with all the power and energy of his infinite, eternal, and necessary life. When God hates with his soul or life, it denotes the most absolute and unalterable hatred; as when he swears by his life, to express the most absolute certainty*.

IT

* Isa. xlix. 16.

IT is the character of mankind in general, that they do abominable works *. Man, because of his sin, is represented as abominable to God; Job xv. 16. How much more abominable and filthy is man, who drinketh up iniquity like water? There is a how much more introduced here, an argument from the less to the greater. If he putteth no trust in his saints, if the heavens are not clean in his sight, if his holy angels and heavenly hosts, which are here meant, are not clean, not in respect of any positive defilement, but because of their natural imperfection, as being only derivatively holy; if they are not worthy of confidence, as being destitute of necessary perfection;—how unspeakably vile must man appear, who, not only in his best estate, is less perfect than they; but in his depraved condition, is positively defiled by sin, and so attached to iniquity, that he greedily drinketh it up, as a thirsty person drinketh water? To declare the essential holiness of God, and the great evil of sin, it is said, that he is of purer eyes than to behold evil, and that he cannot look on iniquity; Hab. i. 13. This is a metaphor taken from a person, who has such a thorough abhorrence of any object, that he cannot look upon it, that the very appearance or apprehension of it makes his nature shudder. The strongest metaphors that nature can afford, are heaped on each other, to declare the abominable nature of sin to the holy God: which expressions are by no means to be confined to idolatry, as only denoting God's hatred of it, but to be extended to all sin whatsoever. Their vine is of the vine of Sodom, and of the fields of Gomorrah: Their grapes are grapes of gall, their clusters are bitter. Their wine is the poison of dragons, and the cruel venom of asps †. As the guilt of sin refers to the justice of God, and is the obligation of the sinner to punishment, because of the transgression of the law; so the filth of sin respects his holiness, and is that which renders the sinner abominable in the eyes of Infinite Purity.

5. THAT

* Psal. xiv. 1.

† Deut. xxxii. 33, 34.

5. THAT sin is an evil thing, is evident from that malignity which is in its nature. Does the Justice of God proclaim the guilt of sin? Do we learn its filth from its contrariety to Divine holiness? Its malignity also appears by its opposition to the alluring perfection of love. The first sin of man included this in it. For it was a rebellion not only against the just and holy God, but against that God who had eminently manifested his goodness and liberality to man, in giving him every thing that could tend to his temporal comfort, and that could encourage and enable him to secure his eternal happiness by obedience; especially in entering into a federal transaction with his own creature, in delivering his law in the form of a covenant containing a promise of life, when he might have simply revealed his will in the form of a law, guarded by the penalty of death. The great and unmerited goodness of God towards his creature, appeared in making him a party with himself, in coming under an obligation to the work of his own hands, for the gift of that which it was of his own free love to bestow. Therefore there was great malignity in the sin of Adam, as committed against such ineffable goodness. But the wickedness that is in sin is greatly increased by reason of the revelation of grace to lost mankind. The love of God was, indeed, displayed to innocent man. But it was not displayed with such lustre, at so great an expence, and in a manner so infinitely transcendent, as in the promulgation of eternal life through the Son of God. Divine love to innocent man was undeserved; but love to fallen man is opposed to the greatest demerit. As it is the contrariety of sin to infinite holiness that constitutes its essence; opposition to infinite love constitutes its highest aggravation. The evil of sin surpasses comprehension in all, but it is of such a superlative nature in gospel-hearers, that it cannot be surpassed. Sin against the law of nature, although it has the essence of sin, being commuted against law, is yet comparatively no sin, when put in the balance with that which is committed against the light and love of the gospel.

gospel. Therefore saith our Lord of the Jews: If I had not come and spoken unto them, they had not had sin *. To represent this malignity which belongs to sin, it is declared, that the carnal mind is enmity against God †. Therefore is sin in Scripture so often described under the notion of wickedness; not as if that sin only were meant, which is open and enormous, as some apprehend; but to intimate that wickedness which is essential to every sin, as committed against a God of love and mercy.

6. BECAUSE it makes man the slave of Satan. By the law of his creation, he is the subject of God. To him he owes his service, and to him only. From this argument, the Psalmist encourages others to worship God. Know ye, that the Lord is God; it is he that hath made us, and not we ourselves; we are his people, and the sheep of his pasture ‡. His innumerable mercies of a temporal nature, in feeding, clothing, and protecting us, are additional motives enforcing our subjection to him. In him we live and move, and have our being. And if we live by him, we certainly ought to live to his glory. His grace in the work of redemption is a superadded tie to his service, strongly enforcing every other.—But sin alienates us from the service of God, and engages us in that of Satan his enemy. For he that committeth sin is of the devil, for the devil sinneth from the beginning §. Man, as dead in trespasses and sins, walks according to the course of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience; Eph. ii. 1. 2. Here the Apostle, in a beautiful and striking manner, connects two ideas, that in themselves directly oppose each other, but perfectly harmonize in man as unregenerate. These are death and life. He describes the spiritual death of man, as consisting in a life of sin and subjection to Satan, in walking according to the course, or, as the expression might well be rendered, according to the LIFE of this world. And indeed, the life of this world is at best nothing more than a state of spiritual death. That must must be evil indeed, that transforms the servants of God, those who are bound by a threefold cord to his service, into the slaves of Satan. It was the glory of Adam, that he was *the son of God: But sin makes the subjects of it the children of the devil. It changes the heir of eternal life into a child of wrath and heir of hell. It effaces the image of God, and imprints the image of the wicked one. Justly may the Lord say: They have corrupted themselves; their spot is not the spot of my children; they are a perverse and crooked generation. Do ye thus requite the Lord, O! foolish people and unwise? Is not he thy Father that hath BOUGHT thee? Hath he not MADE thee, and ESTABLISHED thee †.

* John xv. 22. † Rom. viii. 7. ‡ Psal. c. 3. § 1 John iii. 8.

FROM what has been said on this subject, we may infer,

1. THAT those who have never seen sin to be evil and bitter, have no fear of God. We do not say, that all who have had this view of sin really fear him; for this depends on the nature of the discovery obtained. But we are certain, that those who have had no discovery whatsoever of the evil and bitterness of sin, have no fear of God. This is an inference native from our text; because forsaking the Lord by sin, and having no fear of him, are used as expressions of the same import. It is an evil thing—that thou hast forsaken the Lord thy God, and that my fear is not in thee, saith the Lord God of Hosts. This cuts off all obdurate sinners, who never had their consciences burdened by a sense of sin, whatever be their pretensions to what is called moral rectitude or virtue, from all claim to the character of fearers of God.

2. THE danger of entertaining trivial thoughts of sin. This is nothing else than for a man to think lightly of his own ruin, yea, his eternal ruin; and what is unspeakably more, to contemn God, against whose being and perfections it is the most daring attack. Certain it is, that all who think little of sin in this world, will, at least in the world to come, be convinced of their extreme folly. May the Lord grant you an earlier discovery covery of it, for then it will be too late. For they that go down to the pit, do not show forth God's praise. Those who are strangers to the evil of sin, are truly in a miserable situation. They are languishing under a dreadful disease, and know not their sickness. They are going on in a state of the most deplorable enmity; and know not, or care not, that they are adversaries to God, and that God is their adversary. Sinners, you cannot chuse a worse enemy than God. You would be safe with, yea, from every other enemy, were God your friend. But his arm is strong against his adversaries. His fury shall burn to the lowest hell, towards those who go on in their trespasses.

* Luke iii. 38. † Deut. xxxii. 5. 6.

3. WE may see the dreadful ingratitude that is in sin. This charge God exhibits in verse 21. Yet I had planted thee a noble vine, wholly a right seed: how then art thou turned into the degenerate plant of a strange vine unto me? What would you think of a child, who, although under God, owing his being, nourishment, education, and every temporal comfort, to his parents, would yet rise up against them, and seek their destruction? He that striketh his father or mother, is cursed of God, and reprobated of man. But every sinner is a parricide. This is all the return that we have made to our kind and compassionate Father in heaven; we have lifted up the heel against him. Sin is such a miracle of ingratitude, that God appeals the justness of his complaint, even to the irrational and inanimate creatures; because these are, in their different orders, unspeakably more attentive and obedient than man, and have all fulfilled the end of their creation, but in as far as prevented by his rebellion: Hear, O heavens! and give ear, O earth! for the Lord hath spoken. I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me.*

4. WE may infer the impossibility of delivering ourselves from sin. This is declared, verse 22. For though thou wash thee with nitre, and take thee much soap, yet thine iniquity is marked before me, saith the Lord God.

* Isai. i. 2.

The stain of sin is so deep, that all the nitre and soap of our own doings or sufferings can never wash it out. They shall be as ineffectual as washing in the waters of Jordan would have been, for the removal of Naaman's leprosy, without the special command of God. All the sinner's own washing makes him only the fouler in the eye of his judge. It is but adding sin to sin *.

Finally, We may learn the necessity of washing in the blood of Christ. If every other method of purification will be unavailing, there is surely the greatest reason for applying to his precious blood. This is the fountain opened for sin and uncleanness †. The virtue of this fountain corresponds both to the evil and bitterness of sin. It is opened for sin; and thus takes away its bitterness, with respect to all the consequences of guilt. It is opened for uncleanness; and so removes that abominable pollution flowing from the evil of its nature. The blood of Christ cleanseth us from all sin. It removes the dominion of sin, when applied in regeneration; its guilt in justification; its filth in gradual sanctification; and at length, its very being in the soul, in the perfection of holiness, when the believer is translated to glory.

* Isai. xxx. 1.

† Zech. xiii. 1.

S E R M O N II.

ON THE BITTERNESS OF SIN.

JER. ii. 19.

—Know therefore and see, that it is an evil thing and bitter, that thou hast forsaken the Lord thy God.—

SIN may be fitly enough compared to that little book which the Angel gave to John, and commanded him to eat. It was sweet as honey in his mouth, but it was bitter in his belly. The sweetness of sin to the carnal nature, in the commission, often overpowers all sense of its evil in the mind or conscience of the sinner. But its bitterness will be found by him at some period or other. Although it may not operate so speedily as in the case of the Apostle in the Revelation; yet, in the end, its effects will be as sensible, and far more alarming. When his iniquity, like the roll given to the Prophet Ezekiel, is spread out before him, he shall then assuredly see, that it is written within and without, and that it contains nothing but lamentations, and mourning, and wo *. This metaphor, indeed, is expressly used in the word of God. Though wickedness be sweet in his mouth, though he hide it under his tongue; though he spare it, and forsake it not,—yet his meat in his bowels is turned, it is the gall of asps within him.—Surely he shall not find quietness in his belly †. In the preceding discourse, we have a little considered the evil of sin; we now proceed to what was proposed,

III. To speak of its Bitterness.

I. SIN is so bitter in its consequences, that it hath deprived us of all good. It hath robbed us of the image of God ; which, as it was the highest testimony of his favour, was the tenure by which every other was held. Man being in honour, continued not ; but became like the beasts that perish. Having cast away the Divine likeness, he could no longer enjoy the communications of God's love ; but must necessarily become the object of his detestation. His favour is not only the foundation of all good, of the enjoyment of every blessing, of what nature soever ; but is itself the very compound and essence of all good. Life lies in his favour ; yea, his loving kindness is better than life. But man, by the entrance of sin, hath lost the favour of God, converted his best friend into an enemy, and thus voluntarily bereaved himself of all the blessings that he either enjoyed or hoped for.
of

* Rev. x. 9, 10.; Ezek. ii. 9, 10.

† Job xx. 12, 13, 14. 20.

SIN makes the greatest separation possible between God and man. Therefore in the verse before us, it is called a forsaking of the Lord our God, and it provokes the Lord to forsake us, and to hide his face, so that he will not hear. When we compare man's first estate, as the child of God, the friend and favourite of Heaven, a kind of link between heaven and earth, as partaking both of spirit and matter, closely united in one person, and this dignified by original righteousness,—with his state as a sinner, cast out of God's presence, friendship and protection, become as the beasts that perish, and changed into the link of a dreadful union between earth and hell ; justly may we confess, with the deepest sense of the wickedness of our apostasy, that it is an evil thing and bitter, that we have forsaken the Lord our God. Our moral distance from God, as sinners, removes us farther from him than even our natural distance as creatures. For sin incapacitates us for the service and enjoyment of God ; whereas our natural distance was, in some manner, diminished by the participation of the Divine image in holiness. Made like to God, although infinitely removed from him by our finite nature, we were qualified for glorifying and enjoying him.

THUS

THUS man forfeited all communion with God. Adam being the son of God, had that easy access to his Father, and intercourse with him, which were evidences and seals of his sonship. He delighted in the presence of God. Uninterrupted fellowship with him was the support of his soul, and the joy of his life. But as soon as sin entered, he not only ceased to enjoy, but ceased to desire communion with God. That voice of majesty and love, the sound of which was wont to fill his heart with the highest delight, thenceforth inspired him with shame and terror only. Instead of going forth to meet his Father and friend, instead of cheerfully answering his call, he was afraid and hid himself.—Sin, as it deprived man of communion with God in the present life, excluded every hope of life eternal. His expulsion from the earthly paradise, was a declaration of his exclusion from the paradise of God. The guard of cherubims, and of the flaming sword, that was set upon Eden to keep the way of the tree of life, declared the impossibility of salvation by that covenant which was already broken.—As he lost all spiritual and eternal blessings by sin, he also forfeited his right to every temporal blessing. Man, by becoming like the beasts, lost his dominion over them. Common mercies are vouchsafed to us as sinners, only as bread and water are to a criminal, until the time arrive, when either the sentence of the law is executed, or he partakes of the clemency of his Sovereign.

2. SIN hath subjected us to all penal evil. That is called penal, which is of the nature of punishment, which respects our guilt, and is inflicted by God as a vindictive judge. Thus it is distinguished from moral evil or sin, which is its procuring cause, and from that chastisement, which, although in its own nature evil, yet to the children of God bears in it nothing of punishment, and eventually works for their good. It hath subjected us to the curse of the law; for the law saith, Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things. The unavoidable consequence of disobedience to the law, in its commanding power, is a subjection to its condem- natory

natory sentence. It hath exposed us to the wrath of God, both in this life, and in that which shall never have an end ; the effects of which we may consider afterwards. Offended justice hath nothing in reserve for sinners, but indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish *. The afflictions of this life are all the fruits of sin. To those who are under its power they are really penal ; they discover God's wrath, although in a limited respect, and are presages of that dreadful portion which is still in reserve. It is sin that hath subjected our nature to corruption. The body of man being gross matter, hath not in itself, indeed, a principle of immortality ; but without the evil of sin, the holiness of the soul would have preserved it from decay. It would have been confirmed in this state of incorruption, as a fruit of the love and power of God, in the same manner as the bodies of the glorified saints, shall be, although without the intervention of a Mediator.—It is sin that gives to death, not only its sting, but its very being. For death being a punishment, there could have been nothing of this kind without sin. Therefore, as descriptive of the glory of that state which insures a complete deliverance from sin, it is declared ; There shall be no more death †. The people of God are indeed subject to its stroke, because it is appointed for all men once to die. But they are freed from its sting, by their interest in the death of Christ ; and thus, to allude to the words of Agag ‡, to them the bitterness of death is past. The tree of the cross of Christ makes the waters of death, which are naturally bitter, sweet to all believers §. Being delivered from the power of the second death, the first can do them no harm.—Here it may be inquired ; “ If believers be delivered from “ the sting of death,” through the death of Christ, why “ not also from its stroke ? ” The death of Christ undoubtedly had sufficient merit to have delivered all his people, not only from the sting, but also from the stroke of death, had God so determined ; because the greater includes

* Rom. ii. 8, 9.

† Rev. xxi. 4.

‡ 1 Sam. xv. 32.

§ Exod. xv. 23.

includes the less. If it was sufficiently meritorious to deliver them from spiritual and eternal death, much more to deliver them from what is only temporal. Perhaps, the translation of Enoch and Elijah may be considered as proofs of this. But God had determined, that all his people, these two excepted, should taste of natural death. Were it his pleasure, he could easily complete their sanctification, as well as their justification, in a moment. But as this would be unsuitable to the world they live in, it is his will, that their sanctification should be gradually advanced by ordinances and providences, especially by those of a trying nature: and as he hath seen meet gradually to sanctify them by afflictions, he hath appointed the stroke of death to be the mean of perfecting this work.—But it may be said, “ If Christ “ was not to purchase deliverance for his people from “ temporal death, there was no necessity for his dying “ literally; it had been enough for him to have sustain“ ed the full measure of Divine wrath, which would “ have removed the sting, without subjection to the “ stroke.” To this we reply, That Christ could not possibly sustain the full measure of Divine wrath, or the full energy of the curse of the law, without natural death. For without the shedding of blood there is no remission. He was to give his soul an offering for sin. The law expressly demands, that the soul that sinneth should die. God, in sovereign mercy, admitted of a surety instead of the principal offender. But he could not, in justice to himself, so far dispense with the law, as to alter or abridge the penalty. Besides, our Lord, by his temporary continuance in the grave, was to sanctify it as a bed of rest for all his people; and by his glorious resurrection, receive for himself, as their Surety, a legal acquittal from the sentence of the law; that they, through his righteousness, thus declared to be complete, might obtain justification, and by virtue of his resurrection, be raised to newness of life in this state, and to eternal blessedness at length.

3. SIN hath introduced disorder into the whole creation of God. It had this fatal effect in heaven itself.

There,

There, before the being of sin, the most perfect harmony reigned. Every thought, and expression, and action of all the angelic hosts, was directed to the highest end,—glory to God supreme. Then, without one discordant note, all these morning-stars sung together, and these sons of God shouted for joy. But how dreadful the change produced by sin! It made a temporary blank in heaven. Myriads of angels, once as holy as any around the throne, being alienated from the service of God, and having lost his image, were banished from his presence, and from the glorious society of their former companions; banished for ever, without the most distant prospect of reconciliation, and condemned to everlasting punishment. But when sin had made its entrance into heaven, it could scarcely be expected that it should long remain a stranger to earth. That presumptuous spirit who made war against God within the very limits of his throne, soon transferred it to his footstool. He who had laboured to dethrone God in heaven, could not rest without a strenuous effort to rob him of his glory on earth. What he in vain attempted against the glorious Original, he soon effected on man, his holy, but mutable image. God, for the more illustrious display of his perfections, permitted man to abuse the freedom of his will, by listening to the temptation of Satan, and transgressing the covenant. As man was thus alienated from the love and service of God, deprived of his favour, and subjected to the curse of his broken law; he was also bereaved of the society of holy angels, and secluded from their friendship. As it was his glory to be *made but a little lower than they, having the same glorious crown of the Divine image, eminently consisting in holiness, conferred on him, although shining with inferior lustre; when he trampled this crown under foot, he was justly deprived of this honourable society, as being an unfit companion for the sons of God. As created in the likeness of God, he was constituted his vicegerent on earth, and made to have dominion over the works of his hand, and to have all things under his feet*. But all these works, as revenging the quarrel of their injured Creator, rose up in arms against this ungrateful rebel. Those very creatures that, in his state of innocency, passed before him in review, acknowledging their subjection, and receiving names from him correspondent to their natures, after his fall, disowned his authority, declared themselves his enemies, and waged war against him. The curse immediately aimed against him, reached them also, and introduced an unceasing enmity amongst the different species of creatures, that before lived in peace. The very ground that he trode on, being cursed for his sake, as a perpetual monitor of his sin, instead of the rich fruits that it formerly produced spontaneously, presented him with thorns and thistles, and seemed to grudge the scanty subsistence that nature requires, by demanding as its price, the sweat of his brow.

* Psal. viii. 5.

THUS the Apostle, in the most striking language, describes the effects of sin on the lower creation, as subjecting the creature to vanity, to the bondage of corruption, to a state of the most earnest expectation of deliverance. For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now, Rom. viii. 22. The inferior creatures seem to treat all the dominion that man assumes over them, as if it were mere usurpation. It must indeed be remembered, that God, in the covenant which he established with Noah, made a grant of these for his use. But there is no grant of absolute dominion over them specified, as before the entrance of sin. Nay, it appears, that this new and solemn grant would never have been vouchsafed without a relation to the Covenant of Grace. Temporal mercies, indeed, flow from God as a Creator. But only through an interest in this Covenant, can we have a proper right to them, be delivered from the curse, naturally attending them all, as the just desert of sin, and receive a special blessing with them. For whatever grant is made to mankind in general of the use of the creatures; they only have a proper lordship over them, who are within the bond of the everlasting Covenant. For it is expressed as the privilege of the righteous; Thou shalt be in league with the stones of the field, and the beasts of the field shall be at peace with thee *. In allusion to the disorder introduced into the intelligent creation of God, in the separation of man from the love and fellowship of holy elect angels, Paul represents it as the mystery of God's will, that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he might gather together in one, or gather together unto an head, all things in Christ; both which are in heaven, and which are on earth †. In reference to the disorder introduced into the lower creation, the same Apostle declares, that the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God ‡.

* Psal. viii. 6.

THE IV. thing proposed is, to show by what proofs sinners may know and see that sin is evil and bitter.

THEY may know and see this,

1. By the commands and threatenings of the law. The principal end that God had in view in exhibiting these to men as sinners, was to declare the nature and the punishment of sin; or, in the words of our text, to make them know and see that it is an evil thing and bitter, that they have forsaken the Lord. By the commands of the law, we may see the holiness of God, and, of consequence, the evil of sin; by its threatenings we are assured of his justice, and, therefore, of the punishment of sin. The law was never revealed to man since the fall for justification, but only for conviction and self-condemnation; That every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may become guilty before God:—For by the law is the knowledge of sin §. Here we do not speak of the illustrious use, and absolute necessity of the law, as a rule of life and everlasting obedience to believers, in the hand of Christ the Mediator, but only of its design and use with respect to men as sinners. A discovery

* Job v. 23.

† Eph. i. 10.

‡ Rom. viii. 19.

§ Rom. iii. 19, 20.

discovery of the holiness of the precept, and of the strictness of the penalty, makes the sinner know, that he can have no expectation of salvation, by attempting obedience to the one, or satisfaction to the other. By the operation of the Holy Spirit, it is a mean to lead him out of himself, and to reduce him to the necessity of seeking salvation in the obedience and sufferings of the glorious Surety. For the law is a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ. It is, indeed, a severe schoolmaster. But all its severity is necessary to banish from the heart of the sinner his foolish hope of salvation by his own doings, either in whole or in part. Now, what is the language of the law to transgressors? The soul that sinneth, it shall die; yea, dying thou shalt die. It not only threatens death, but death in all its extent; death temporal, spiritual and eternal. The law, which is the first refuge of every sinner who becomes sensible of guilt, is his worst enemy, and acts the part of an accuser. The justice of God, with which he endeavours to compound matters, appears as a vindictive and inexorable judge, who will remit nothing of the rigour of the law. Death, whom he endeavours to mollify and bribe by fair promises and forced resolutions *, appears as his executioner, and the servant of both.

2. BY terrors of conscience. These are the necessary consequences of a discovery of the commands and threatenings of the law, when the sinner sees no way of hope opened up by them, and knows not of any other; if he is not left to abandon himself to greater excess of riot, and to dissipate his apprehensions, arising from a sense of sin, in an uncontrouled indulgence of it. Often, indeed, he seeks a remedy from giving loose reins to his disease. He looks for health and peace in the progress of his destructive malady. Terrors of conscience, as they are the fruit of sin, are to the sinner a declaration of its evil and bitterness. Cain was a striking example of the power of a discased

* Isa. xxviii. 15.

eased conscience. This murderer of his brother had such a sense of his sin, at least of the demerit of it, that he feared an avenger of blood in every one of his brethren. So loud was the cry of innocent blood in his conscience, that he expresses himself in such a manner, as if he had been sensible that he deserved as many deaths as there were men in the world to inflict them: —It shall come to pass, that every one that shall find me shall slay me *. We have a very affecting description of the end of the wicked man, notwithstanding all his worldly comforts, Job xxvii. 20—22. Terrors take hold on him as waters, a tempest stealeth him away in the night. The east-wind carrieth him away, and he departeth: and as a storm hurleth him out of his place. For God shall cast upon him, and not spare: he would fain flee out of his hand. Job, although a child of God, elsewhere expresses an affecting sense of these in his own soul, chap. xxx. 15—17. Terrors are turned upon me: they pursue my soul as the wind; and my welfare passeth away as a cloud. And now my soul is poured out upon me: the days of affliction have taken hold upon me. My bones are pierced in me in the night-season; and my sinews take no rest †.

Men, under a sense of guilt, are sensible, that because of their iniquities they deserve nothing but eternal and ineffable wrath; and they have the first fruits of this in these awful terrors of conscience that haunt them even in this life. A fear of wrath frequently spreads a gloom over their happiest days, and evaporates the spirit of their most ravishing enjoyments. The terrors of the Lord often embitter the cups of the drunkard, dissipate the delights of the wanton amidst his darling debaucheries, or, in a moment, turn to dross all the treasure of the avaricious earthworm, so that it appears to him as of no more value than the dust, or the mire of the street, like which it has been heaped up ‡. The reason of this dissatisfaction, attending carnal enjoyments, is assigned by the Prophet Ezekiel, chap. vii. 19. Their silver

* Gen. iv. 14.

† See also Job vi. 4.

‡ Zech. ix. 3.

silver and their gold shall not be able to deliver them in the day of the wrath of the Lord: they shall not satisfy their souls, neither fill their bowels; because it is the stumbling-block of their iniquity. They can reap no comfort from their worldly or sensual gratifications in the day of Divine indignation; because the indulgence of these is the very cause of it. These can never afford them comfort, because they are the source of their trouble. Amidst all their joy, the sound of a shaken leaf shall chase them. Scarcely had the impious Belshazzar profaned the holy vessels of the temple of the Lord, and observed the fingers of a man's hand writing on the wall of the palace, before *his countenance was changed, and his thoughts troubled him; so that the joints of his loins were loosed, and his knees smote one against another. All his noble Princes, his wives and concubines, his costly dainties, and generous wines, all his pomp and glory, yea, all his gods in whom he trusted, could avail nothing to deliver him from the terrors of his conscience, when the hand of the God of heaven was upon him. No companions, no joys can avail the man whose soul is pierced with the arrows of the Almighty. When in company, he wishes for solitude, that, if possible, he may find peace there. When in solitude, he finds a troubled conscience such a bad companion, that he rushes back into the throng, and endeavours to silence it by the noise of mirth and folly. When it is night, he wishes for day: When he lies down, he saith, When shall I arise and the night be gone? and is full of tossings to and fro, unto the dawning of the day†. When it is day, he languishes for night, that he may hide his head in darkness. But he learns, that there is no darkness nor shadow of death, where the workers of iniquity may hide themselves ‡. He finds himself beset behind and before, and the Lord's hand still lying upon him. If he say, Surely the darkness shall cover me, then is the night light about him. After all his attempts, he is forced to acknowledge, although in another sense than the Psalmist;
Yea,

* Dan. v. 6.

† Job vii. 4.

‡ Job xxxiv. 22.

Yea, the darkness hideth not from thee, but the night shineth as the day; the darkness and the light are both alike unto thee *.

3. From the complaints of God's people, on account of sin. Here we shall not mention the complaints of sin that arise from some experience of legal terror, but such only as flow from a constant sense of its filth and abominableness to the holy God; because those proceed especially from a discovery of its guilt, and do not properly belong to their exercise as Christians; whereas these proceed from a ruling and permanent hatred of it in their hearts. They every where, when rightly exercised, represent it as their heaviest burden; and however great their afflictions, they consider sin as greater than any other. We have a remarkable instance of this in David, after he had offended God in numbering the people; as if his strength, and the strength of Israel, had consisted in the multitude of his subjects, and not in the Lord of Hosts, who was the chariots of Israel, and the horsemen thereof. He said unto the Lord, I have greatly sinned in that I have done; and now I beseech thee, O Lord, take away the iniquity of thy servant; for I have done very foolishly; 2 Sam. xxiv. 10. The first thing that smote his heart was not a fear of the effects of his sin, but a sense of its evil and vileness. We are not to imagine, that this proceeded from ignorance of God's design to chastise him severely for it; for before he spoke these words, he had received an intimation of the Divine purpose. From the tenor of this part of the scripture-history, we evidently see, that this confession of sin was in consequence of God's declaration by the mouth of his Prophet. Before this, it would seem, he had no due sense of his sin. But the reason of his speaking in this manner is given in verse 11. For when David was up in the morning, the word of the Lord came unto the Prophet Gad. A sense of the dishonour he had done to God, was more affecting to him than even the prospect of that dreadful calamity with with which he was threatened.—With the same temper of mind he elsewhere expresses his sense of the burdensome nature of sin. My iniquities are gone over mine head; as an heavy burden, they are too heavy for me *. How very different is the language of the sinner from that of the saint under a sense of sin! The sinner considers it only with respect to its effect, in punishment; but the saint, with respect to its evil nature, in offending God. This was the complaint of Cain; My punishment is greater than that I can bear. But how much more noble is the language of Joseph, How can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God. The Christian, however heavy his afflictions, never appears miserable to himself, but as lying under the burden of sin. The holy Apostle Paul very pathetically describes his afflictions in the work of the gospel. He approved himself the minister of Christ, in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses, in stripes, in imprisonments, in tumults, in labours, in watchings, in fastings †. Such a multiplicity of evils would have made a sinner cry out, O wretched man that I am! But notwithstanding the variety and constancy of his trials, he found consolation in them, he found something to alleviate his distress. We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed ‡. He reserves his complaint of misery for sin. He could see nothing of real wretchedness in his situation, but as it arose from the pollution and prevalence of his own iniquity: O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death §. There is not, there cannot be any real misery in the world, but what is the fruit of sin, or consists in the power of sin itself.

* Psa. cxxxix. 12.

As sin is the greatest burden of the saints on earth, deliverance from it, and perfect conformity to Christ is the greatest joy of heaven. This is represented as a matter of much greater importance than deliverance from all afflictions; yea, as the cause of the other. *The inhabitant shall not say, I am sick: for the people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity. Deliverance from sin has the precedence to the enjoyment of God; for however inestimable this privilege, perfection in holiness is the foundation of it, that without which there can be no enjoyment of God, or, were it possible there could, that without which there could be no happiness in this enjoyment. Therefore the enjoyment of God is given as the evidence of complete deliverance from sin, or, in other words, of complete conformity to Christ; as reserving the principal place to the latter: When he shall appear, we shall be LIKE him; for we shall see him as he is †.
from

* Psal. xxxviii. 4. † 2 Cor. vi. 4, 5. ‡ 2 Cor. iv. 8, 9.

§ Rom. vii. 24.

4. By the punishments inflicted on sinners in this life. The Lord is righteous, he hath cut asunder the cords of the wicked ‡. The threatenings of the word are indeed a fuller declaration of God's anger against sin, than all his providential dispensations; because all the punishment inflicted on sinners in this world, may be justly considered as an earnest only, compared to the full wages awaiting them in the world to come. But there are many dispensations of Providence recorded in Scripture, in which we may read the evil and bitterness of sin in the most legible characters; although these dispensations were meant as preludes only of that indignation which is in store.—The destruction of the old world by a deluge of waters, was an awful display of the evil of man's iniquity, and most evidently declared, that he had thereby lost all title to this earth, to life, or to any of its comforts. So great was the corruption of man, that it is metaphorically represented as extending to the very earth on which he trode. God looked upon the earth, and behold, it was corrupt; for all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth §. So great is his indignation at sin, that he would not only destroy all flesh, but the earth itself, by defacing its beauty, and spoiling it of the most striking remains of that

* Isai. xxxiii. 24.

† 1 John iii. 2.

‡ Psal. cxxix. 4.

§ Gen. vi. 12, 13.

that original grandeur which was impressed on it at the creation, when prepared as an habitation for innocent man. God could not smell a savour of rest from the earth, till it was thus washed by the flood * ; nor could his Church be saved from the common destruction but by water, which is a figure of the same kind with that baptism, which doth now save us †. We are not to apprehend that this tremendous judgment was inflicted, because the world was then a great deal worse than it has ever been since. We have reason to think, that it is as bad now as it ever was since the creation. There are crimes perpetrated in our time, which, in all probability, were unknown to sinners before the flood. Indeed, corrupt human nature is ever radically the same ; but since that awful æra, Satan and the wicked world have enjoyed a series of about four thousand years for acquiring greater experience, and making new discoveries in the practical science of sin. This is a science of such a kind, that no man needs to be taught the rudiments of it. For it is born with every man, and it is his first work to reduce it into an art. But there are refinements in it, the invention of which has required no small labour of that wisdom which is both sensual and devilish. As it is evident, that the world is at least no better now than before the flood ; and as God hath nevertheless assured us, that he will not again bring an universal destruction upon it, till the general conflagration ; we may be assured, that that judgment was intended as an awful and perpetual declaration of the desert of sin, and of that sacrifice which Divine justice requires every hour ; and also as an illustrious display of the forbearance of God towards the world still lying in wickedness.

THE destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities of the plain, contained the same lesson of the evil of sin. In that already mentioned, it was indeed expressed by water, and in this by fire. But both were

VOL. I.

E

* Gen. viii. 21.

† I Pet. iii. 20, 21.

were types of the final judgment; and this, although not so universal, was yet more literal, and not merely a type of the destruction of the world by fire, but of the eternal punishment of the wicked: for they are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire *. This awful visitation is expressed in the most striking language: The Lord rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrah brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven; Gen. xix. 24. Their destruction came from that very quarter to which they should have looked for salvation. The cry of their sin was so loud, and the cry of Divine justice so importunate, that even righteous Lôt, while he lingered, is represented as in danger of being consumed in the iniquity of the city. The punishment was so just, and the danger so imminent, that one retrospective glance of regret or curiosity instantly converted one of the four, saved from destruction, into a perpetual monument of disobedience and folly, ver. 15, 16. 26.

THE overthrow of all the Israelites who came out of Egypt, except two persons, was an awful declaration of God's anger against sin †. It was on this account, that all the seven nations of Canaan were devoted to destruction.—We might further mention many instances of the destruction of individuals, as of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, Nadab and Abihu, upon whom the Lord visibly executed his judgments, to show how abominable sin is in all.—But the time would fail us to enumerate them. God, in his infinite wisdom, saw meet to exhibit these visible testimonies of his displeasure, in a more frequent, observable and tremendous manner in those ages, in which there was not so clear a discovery of his hatred of sin as is given in his written word; or when Revelation was confined to one people, and the Church, being in a state of minority, laboured under the bondage and terrors of a legal dispensation. But even since the commencement of the Christian dispensation, since the more general propagation propagation of Christianity, God hath discovered, in a very discernible manner, his detestation of sin, by the course of his providence with nations, and especially in the destruction of the Jews. If men would but read the language of Divine providence, and compare it with the threatenings of the word, with former examples of a like nature, in what light would they view the desolations brought on cities and nations, by fire, by famine, by sword and pestilence, but as so many testimonies of the evil and bitterness of sin? He turneth the fruitful land into barrenness, for the wickedness of them that dwell therein; Psa. cvii. 34. So literally is this threatening verified in the course of providence, that travellers can scarcely believe the authenticity of ancient histories, and infidels presume to deny the truth of the holy Scriptures; because they find some of the countries, which are there described as so fertile and beautiful, so wonderfully changed, that they can scarcely think them the same: while all this is only a proof of the truth of God's word, in the accomplishment of his threatenings, because of the wickedness of the inhabitants in former or later ages. Nay the judgments which, in our own times, are often executed upon individuals, who have been distinguished for their iniquities, are sometimes so striking, and evidently proceeding in so immediate a manner from the hand of God, that even the most obdurate are forced to consider them as the punishment of sin, and as a declaration of its unspeakable desert. Indeed, if men can discover any plausible vent for their infidelity, by the apparent intervention of secondary causes, however remote, the generality of observers will attribute the most uncommon effects to these, rather than give so severe a wound to their own sin, as to acknowledge them to be the effects of the immediate interposition of the first Cause, and affecting displays of Divine vengeance.

* Jude, ver. 7.

† 1 Cor. x. 5.

5. MANY see and know the evil and bitterness of sin, by their own eternal misery. Those who, still in this life, continue strangers to these things, notwithstanding ing all the testimonies that God gives of his displeasure, shall see and know them to their fatal experience, in that life that shall never have an end. The damned in hell see what sin is by their eternal exclusion from the presence of God, from the love of Christ, from the society of the godly; and they shall learn it more fully by their eternal sufferings both in soul and body. Although they could give all their former substance for * that love which they have despised to the end, it would not procure one renewed offer of it. They shall never enjoy the least degree of that blessed communion with God, which many of them have considered as a delusion, although they could shed as many tears for it as might extinguish the flames of hell. They shall never, for one moment, enjoy the society of the godly, although, as its price, they should be willing to suffer as many years of torment, as they have committed sins. They shall never be able to redeem their souls, although for every soul they could give a world in exchange †. Although they renounce all their infidelity; yet the more they believe, they can only tremble the more ‡. Though they should become preachers in hell, it could not procure one drop of water to cool their tongues §. All the pomp of the greatest will avail them nothing there. Hell will only enlarge herself, and open her mouth without measure, that their glory and their multitude, and their pomp, may descend into it. It will only be the more moved to meet them at their coming . There can be no alleviation of misery there, by imparting it to others. Their only comfort, if we may speak of comfort in hell, is to get new companions in misery ††. The presence of the body, that was formerly the minister of sin, can be no consolation; for this can only give greater extent to suffering. Annihilation, consisting in the reduction of both soul and body to non-existence for ever, which is the greatest dread

of

* Cant. viii. 7.

† Matth. xvi. 26.

‡ James ii. 19.

§ Luke xvi. 24. 27.

 Isa. v. 14; xiv. 9. †† Ezek. xxxii. 31.

of human nature, acting according to natural principles, would there be the greatest blessing. But the wicked in hell shall be eternally dying, and yet, after millions of ages, be as eternally remote from death, as when they first began to suffer.

It has now indeed become a fashionable doctrine, to deny, or at least to talk with uncertainty, of the eternity of hell. Men, under a pretence of exalting the Divine perfections, as if they knew better what were suitable to them than God himself, consider it as inconsistent with these, that he should punish sinners of mankind, or even devils with everlasting suffering. But for this doctrine there is not the least shadow of foundation in the word of God. On the contrary, the expressions that are used, evidently denote eternity in its strict and proper sense. The burnings of hell are declared to be everlasting *; its punishment, eternal damnation †, and eternal fire ‡. Nay, expressions, denoting eternity, are redoubled and heaped one upon another, to leave no pretence for imagining, that only a very long course of suffering is meant. Hell is represented as a lake that burneth with fire and brimstone, where the wicked are tormented for ever and ever §. If these expressions are to be understood in a limited sense, as only denoting a long continuance in suffering, which yet admits of a termination; on the same ground, the eternity of the blessedness of the saints is set aside. For there are no stronger expressions used to denote this. They possess the kingdom, and shine as the stars for ever and ever . They reign for ever and ever ††. Yea language itself can afford none stronger, even to express the existence of God, in relation to that eternity which is to come ‡‡. Only it is to be observed, that when applied to him, they are to be understood in a sense infinitely higher than is applicable to any creature, as including his necessary existence.

THIS

* Isai. xxxiii. 14. † Mark iii. 29. ‡ Jude, ver. 7. § Rev. xx. 10.

 Dan. vii. 18.; xii. 3. †† Rev. xxii. 5. ‡‡ Exod. xv. 18.

THIS doctrine, instead of doing honour to the Divine perfections, offers them the greatest insult. But this is a disguise which Satan ordinarily uses when he transforms himself into an angel of light, that with the greater ease he may impose on man's weak and corrupt reason. He pretends to pay far greater regard to the truths of God than they ever have met with before, and to make a sacrifice to the Divine perfections that God utterly disclaims. For, if it be not consistent with the glory of the Divine nature, that one perfection should be glorified at the expence of another; how can we suppose that goodness is, in some distant period, to triumph over justice, nay, over faithfulness in the threatening? Or, if there be no way of salvation but through Christ, and if there be no redemption after death, how can goodness be displayed to those who have been finally impenitent, in abridging their torments, or in affecting their annihilation? Nay, the idea seems to imply in it, not only the grossest absurdity, but the greatest blasphemy. For it supposes that some of the Divine perfections can cease to be, or at least cease to operate, which is the same; that holiness, justice and faithfulness, are as it were to subside, and be lost in the nature of God, as if wearied out with punishing. If mercy shall be eternally displayed in the blessedness of the righteous; there is the very same reason for the eternal display of holiness, justice and truth, in the misery of the wicked. Besides, this presumptuous doctrine has the greatest tendency to relax the authority of the Divine word, to weaken the force of all its threatenings, and of all its promises also, and to encourage sinners in sin; because it presents a distant prospect of deliverance from wrath. Should it be said, that this prospect is so distant, that the fondest mind can have no dependence upon it; let it be considered, that there is no prospect so distant, no dawn of hope so uncertain, nothing that seems within the reach of possibility, but a mind, willing to deceive itself and take

take indulgence in sin, will eagerly grasp at, rather than abandon its natural present and beloved enjoyments. Those who insinuate such doctrine, can be considered in no other point of view, when urging its congruity to the Divine perfections, than as speaking unrighteously for God. And what is the origin of such an idea in any man's mind, but the love of sin, and ignorance of its evil? For it evidently discovers a greater love to the sinner, than either to the glory of the Lawgiver, or to the righteousness of the Redeemer *.

6. IN the sufferings of the Son of God. We mention this last, not because it is last in order of nature, or the last discovery that the sinner obtains of the evil and bitterness of sin, but because it is the greatest discovery of both. All the threatenings of the law, terrors of conscience, temporal judgments, complaints of the godly, yea, all the sufferings of hell are but feeble declarations of the evil of sin, compared with those of Christ. All the sufferings of devils and wicked men through eternity, can never contain

* We cannot view this doctrine in any other light than as a strange attempt to revive, even among Protestants, the justly exploded doctrine of purgatory; to revive it with accumulated absurdity. Papists have deviled and adhered to that doctrine, for their own interest; because it gives such influence to the clergy. Protestants, for the honour of their feelings, and to afford some consolation to sinners continuing in their iniquities, have deviled this as an improvement on the former. They reject the Popish purgatory as ridiculous, and yet present the world with a new scheme much more pregnant with folly. Papists plead for a purgatory, while time endures, between death and judgment. Refining Protestants, for a purgatory after judgment. Papists make their purgatory a preservative against hell. But those wiser teachers make hell itself only a purgatory. Those make their purgatory a preparation for the eternal unalterable state. But these make the eternal state itself only a preparation for some unknown, unimaginable alteration. Seeking to be wise above, yea, against what is written, they transfer the idea of time into eternity, attribute succession and change to that state which admits of neither; and so in reality convert eternity into time.

contain such a discovery of the holiness and justice of God, in the hatred and punishment of sin, as the sufferings of the Lord of glory. These indeed were but the sufferings of one person, and only continued for a time. But the peculiarity of this discovery is owing to the infinite dignity of the Person, as he is God in our nature; whence his temporary sufferings have an infinite value. Were it possible that we could look to the end of eternity, if, for a moment, we may apply to this astonishing subject, the inadequate language of time, we might have some idea of a satisfaction to justice by the sufferings of the damned: but because eternity precludes the very apprehension of an end, and because the wicked are for ever contracting new guilt; we can only have a notion of satisfaction, and of consequence, of the evil of sin, by the eternal duration of their sufferings. But in the temporary sufferings of Christ, we have a full display of the evil and bitterness of sin, because he at once sustained the full load of infinite wrath for his people. The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all *. We cannot indeed see the evil of sin in the person of Christ, for he had no sin of his own; nor had he any pollution, as arising from sin imputed. But the guilt of all the sins of his people was laid on him, and he bare the accumulated sufferings due to them all. He sustained in time as many hells of suffering, as there were sinners to redeem.

As both soul and body were by sin subjected to suffering, and to be saved from it, he suffered in both. His whole life was a life of humiliation, and therefore, to him who was in the form, the state of God, a life of suffering and satisfaction, as well as of obedience. His obedience and suffering were so interwoven, that we cannot well distinguish them. There was suffering in all his obedience, and obedience in all his suffering. He learned obedience by the

* Isa. liii. 6.

the things that he suffered * ; and he became obedient unto death †. Although heaven was his throne, and earth his footstool ; yet so great was his voluntary suffering, that even on his footstool he had not a place where to lay his head. But however great and constant his sufferings, during the course of his obedience, from weariness, faintness, hunger, thirst, temptation, poverty, reproaches, and every evil and infirmity that did not imply sin ; yet his sufferings became vastly more intense from the commencement of his agony, till he said, It is finished.—The sufferings of his body, as proceeding from the hand of man, were great ; in his being scourged and buffeted, in bearing his cross, having his head pierced with thorns, his hands and his feet with nails, and his body suspended in the agonies of crucifixion. Yet the outward sufferings of his body were little, compared with those which it endured, as the partner of his soul. Blood issued from the wounds which his cruel executioners inflicted ; but it issued from every pore of his body, as the fruit of his soul-sufferings. The sufferings of his body, even as partner with his soul, were still as nothing compared with those that he felt in his soul itself. So unspeakable were these, that his soul was exceeding sorrowful, even unto death ‡. It was compassed with sorrows on every side. This did not proceed from any bodily sufferings, for it was the chief cause of his severest sufferings of this kind ; but from a dreadful sense and feeling of the infinite wrath of God as a Judge, due for all the sins of his people, lying upon him. Under this tremendous load, he was deserted of his Father ; and being deprived of the light of his countenance, he endured a dreadful conflict with the powers of darkness §, and suffered the pangs of hell . That same breath of the Lord's indignation, that kindleth the fire of hell ††, kindled such a fire in his holy human soul, that his

VOL. I.

F

heart

* Heb. v. 8.

† Phil. ii. 8.

‡ Mat. xxvi. 38.

§ Luke xxii. 53.

 Psa. xviii. 5.

†† Isa. xxx. 33.

*heart was melted like wax in the midst of his bowels: All the wailings and howlings of the damned to all eternity, will fall infinitely short of expressing the evil and bitterness of sin with such emphasis as these few words; My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? It is only a discovery of sin in the sufferings of Christ that is of a saving nature. Nor can a view of his sufferings as man, with what feelings soever of natural affection and sympathy it be attended, be of any avail here. It is only a believing view of his sufferings as God-man, and a cordial acceptance of, and reliance upon them as the atonement for our sins, that can be profitable for salvation. Surely, saith the Church, he hath born OUR griefs, and carried OUR sorrows:—He was wounded for OUR transgressions, he was bruised for OUR iniquities: the chastisement of OUR peace was upon him, and with his stripes WE are healed †.

WE shall conclude this discourse with a brief exhortation to three classes of persons.

I. To those who are secure in sin.

YOUR state is truly deplorable. You are pining under a dangerous and destructive malady; yet ye know it not. We would therefore offer you a few directions, relative to your present mournful situation. (I.) Be much engaged in reading and meditating on the word of God. Ponder its threatenings. Consider the judgments which it records, as inflicted on sinners. Be concerned especially to obtain a due apprehension of the spirituality and extent of the holy law, all the precepts of which reach to the heart, and concern its most secret thoughts, and the first imaginations of these thoughts. For the word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow; and is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart †.

The

* Psal. xxii. 14.

† Isa. liii. 4, 5.

‡ Heb. iv. 12.

The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul: the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple *. The Apostle declares, from his own experience, that he had not known sin but by the law †. (2.) Diligently attend on the public dispensation of ordinances. The word preached is the ordinary mean that God blesses for conviction and conversion. It was while Peter preached, that the murderers of Christ were pricked to the heart, and cried out, Men and brethren, what shall we do ‡? It was only while the lame man waited at the pool, that he met with Jesus, and was healed by him. Christ, the personal wisdom of God, and the great Prophet of his Church, declares the blessedness of those who carefully regard his institutions, not as if all should be eternally blessed who do so, but because a dispensation of the Gospel is an inestimable privilege in itself, and a regular attendance on it, the only appointed order in which we are allowed to expect the blessing from the God of Jacob, even life for evermore. Blessed is the man that heareth me, watching daily at my gates, waiting at the posts of my doors. For whoso findeth me, findeth life, and shall obtain favour of the Lord §. (3.) Improve afflictions as a mean for discovering sin. This is their language from God to you, as he declares in the verse wherein our text lies: Thine own wickedness shall correct thee, and thy backsliding shall reprove thee; know therefore and see, &c. And how is this accomplished? It is by means of the afflictions procured by them, in which your wickedness and backsliding may be clearly seen. Surely it is meet to be said unto God, I have born chastisement, I will not offend any more. That which I see not, teach thou me; if I have done iniquity, I will do no more . (4.) Meditate on the aggravations, consequences, and desert of sin. In this manner the Prophet Nathan dealt with David about his great transgression, 2 Sam. xii. He declares

* Psal. xix. 7.

† Rom. vii. 7.

‡ Acts ii. 37.

§ Prov. viii. 34, 35.

 Job xxxiv. 31, 32.

declares the aggravation of his sin from a consideration of the many mercies that God had bestowed on him already, and of those also which he might have conferred afterwards, ver. 7, 8. Then he charges home his sin upon his conscience, as a transgression of the commandment of the Lord, as doing evil in his sight, ver. 9. Then he denounces judgments against him, and against his house for ever, as justly procured by his iniquity and ingratitude, ver. 10.—12. And last of all, he exhibits the bitter fruit of his sin, in giving great occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, ver. 14. (5.) Beware of giving loose reins to sin; because it is of a very hardening nature. There is great danger of your being hardened through the deceitfulness of sin. Your disease may run on so far, that like a paralytic person, you may become altogether insensible. By a continued uncontrouled course of sin, your conscience may become seared as with a hot iron. (6.) Be frequently and fervently engaged in prayer to God for a discovery of his holiness, majesty and love. This has a direct tendency to discover the evil of sin. It had this effect on Job. Therefore he addresses himself to God in the following manner: *I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear: but now mine eye seeth thee. Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes. Such a discovery operated in the same way on Isaiah. When he saw the Lord high and lifted up, and heard the awful proclamation of his holiness, he cried out, Wo is me; for I am undone, because I am a man of unclean lips†. (7.) Pray that the holy Spirit may give you a saving view of the evil of sin, especially in the sufferings of Christ. It is his work to convince of sin, He takes of the things of Christ, and shows them unto us. His work, in this respect, is the subject of promise; and therefore it should be matter of earnest prayer: I will pour upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace, and of

* Job xlii. 5, 6.

† Isa. vi. 5.

of supplications ; and they shall look upon me whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn.*

2. To persons who may be under convictions of sin.

(1.) CONSIDER the advantages arising from these. Although, by no means, saving in themselves, yet, under the blessing of God, they tend to bring the sinner to Christ ; for as long as men think themselves whole, they will not apply to the Physician. Convictions do not make you more welcome to the Physician ; but, if not abused, they will make him more acceptable to you. (2.) Cherish your convictions. Many, as soon as they find the law working on their consciences, do all in their power to silence it. When terrified by the roaring of the lion, they endeavour, either to shut their ears, or to stop his mouth, by banishing every thing that tends to disturb their peace in sin. When Cain went out from the presence of the Lord under convictions of sin, he employed himself in building a city, in order to banish them ; as would seem from the connection of his history, Gen. iv. 16, 17. Many plunge themselves into the world ; and the cares of it, and the deceitfulness of riches choke the word, and it becometh unfruitful. Although your serious improvement of convictions cannot insure you of conversion ; yet the Lord may be justly provoked to depart from you for abusing them. His Spirit will not always strive with man, and wo is unto you, Sinners, if God depart from you †. Felix endeavoured to smother his convictions by a proposed delay ; and it does not appear that they ever returned ‡. (3.) Beware of lingering under convictions. Ephraim is represented as an unwise son, because he staid long in the place of the breaking forth of children. This is the way to lose a sense of sin : for light, if not improved, often becomes weaker, nay, is sometimes altogether turned into darkness. (4.) Rest not on convictions,

as

* Zech. xii. 10.

† Hof. ix. 12.

‡ Acts xxiv. 25.

as if they were enough, as if they were a satisfying evidence of salvation. The religion of many professors, we fear, goes no further than this. They have some knowledge of sin, and they think all is well with them. (5.) Consider the danger of silencing convictions, by fleeing to a false refuge. This is only trying to make Satan cast out Satan. This is to go out of one bad situation into a worse: for the case of persons, who rest on their own righteousness, is more dangerous and hopeless than even that of publicans and sinners. (6.) Earnestly pray for converting grace. This God hath promised. I will heal their backslidings; I will love them freely; for mine anger is turned away from him. Let your prayer be that of Ephraim, *Turn thou me, and I shall be turned, for thou art the LORD my God. How necessary and valuable soever those things are, which we have already mentioned, as means for discovering the evil and bitterness of sin, still they are means only: and they will never be of any saving benefit to you, without the efficacious operation of the Spirit of God. (7.) In a dependence on this promised grace, endeavour the present exercise of faith in Christ: God is especially calling you in his word, and particularly, by the common operations of his Spirit, in convictions of sin, to embrace Christ as freely offered to you in the Gospel. The compassionate Saviour is as really proposing this question to every one of you, as he did in the days of his flesh, Wilt thou be made whole? The convictions of a troubled conscience, like the acute pangs of a diseased person, are calling aloud for an application to the Physician; and is there not balm in Gilead, is there not a Physician there? Embrace the blood of Christ, which is that precious balm that alone can heal your diseased souls. Believe his record, with particular application to yourselves, when he testifies to every individual, that in him there is eternal life. Confidently endeavour to rest on the foundation of his gracious, particular and unconditional

* Jer. xxxi. 18.

conditional promises, to trust in his name: and his name is called Jesus, because he saves his people from their sins. This name of the Lord is a strong tower; thither the righteous runneth and is safe.

3. To those who have not only a sense of sin, but a persuasion of deliverance from it.

WE would exhort you, (1.) carefully to enquire, whether this be on a sure foundation. Many apprehend, that they are free from sin, while they are only free from righteousness. Try your own hearts by the word, depending on the omniscient Spirit, that you may discover, whether you have really improved the blood of Christ as the only ground of pardon. Unless you have a satisfying, solid and constant rest here, you ought not to speak peace to yourselves. If you rest on any other foundation, you are speaking peace when sudden destruction is at the door. (2.) Be afraid of losing this comfortable sense of deliverance from sin. None who are interested in the blood of Christ, can be altogether deprived of its efficacy. They can never bring guilt upon their persons, guilt, in relation to God as a judge.—But they may bring guilt on their consciences, by obscuring their sense of pardon. Endeavour to maintain a constant fear of sin as the greatest evil; for it separates between us and our God; and although it cannot separate his people from his love, it often separates them from the evidences of it, by causing him to hide his face. (3.) Strive to obtain further discoveries of the evil of sin. Apprehend not, that, in this respect, you have attained. The believer can never have a full sense of sin, till he be perfectly freed from it. We always look on sin, in this world, with a partial eye; because we cannot entirely separate the idea of sin from the personal interest we have in it; we cannot separate sin from our own minds in judging of it. As an evidence of this, we are generally disposed to be much more severe on the sins of others than our own. Even those sins that we love and indulge in ourselves, we hate and despise, spise, when we see them in others ; although they contain nothing but a portrait of our own hearts, justly delineated. The sinner will then fully know the evil from which he has been delivered, when he fully enjoys the good to which he is redeemed ; not merely the bitterness of sin, by a discovery of the joys of heaven ; but the evil of sin, by the enjoyment of complete holiness. Here he is only pressing forward and following after ; but then he shall know, even as he is known, and apprehend that for which he is also apprehended of Christ. (4.) Let the prevalence of sin be your daily burden. This, we have seen, is the greatest burden that believers have, while in this tabernacle. Let your desires be constantly directed towards that happy state, in which sin shall be no more. (5.) Make daily application to the blood of Christ for sprinkling. Although you can never contract new guilt in relation to God as a Judge, you are daily provoking him as a Father ; and you need daily to apply to the fountain opened. Therefore be concerned constantly to improve it for removing the guilt contracted against your loving Father, and for washing away your daily defilement. And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly : and may your whole spirit, and soul, and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.

S E R M O N III.

ON THE PLAGUE OF THE HEART.

I KINGS, viii. 38.

—Who shall know every man the plague of his own heart.—

MAN has naturally an ardent desire of knowledge. This is a faint memorial of that perfect image of God at first impressed on his heart in creation, of which knowledge was a principal feature. It is also a striking indication of the immortality of his soul, and of that glorious perfection after which he ought eagerly to aspire. This thirst for knowledge is discovered in a thousand different ways; according to the difference of the temper and affections of the mind. But it is truly deplorable, that an inclination in itself so excellent, should be so sadly misapplied; and that men acting according to their natural impulse, should universally occupy their minds with things comparatively trivial, to the total neglect of the one thing needful. While many inquire into the nature of God, and into that of their own souls, as matters of mere speculation, as subjects of curious and entertaining investigation; how few are disposed to contemplate God, as he reveals himself in love and mercy to sinners through Jesus Christ, and to study themselves, as creatures that stand in the most absolute need of so gracious a revelation? While many amuse themselves, by inquiring into the faculties of the soul, and by descanting on the noble powers of which man is possessed; how few are anywise concerned to search into his unspeakable loss in the depravation of these faculties, the causes of this loss, the consequences of it, the power of indwelling corruption, or, in a word, as Solomon expresses it, to know every man the plague of his own heart.

VOL. I. G corruption,

These words are a part of Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the temple. His father David had resolved to build an house for the Lord, but was prevented, being warned of God, that this work was reserved for his son. Accordingly Solomon engaged in it after the death of his father: and having finished the building in the most magnificent manner, he solemnly consecrates it by prayer and sacrifice, to the service of JEHOVAH. In his prayer he enumerates different cases, in which he entreats the Lord's gracious answer from his holy temple. The words of our text refer to some heavy judgment, which Solomon supposes might come upon Israel, because of their iniquities; famine, or pestilence, or blasting or mildew. He supplicates, that, in this mournful situation, the Lord would interpose for their deliverance, when he should be addressed, either by individuals, or by the whole nation; and especially, when the persons, so addressing him, should not only be affected with the outward judgment, but with their own sins; and not merely with their outward transgressions, but with the sins of their hearts, as the source of all others, and the primary cause of all judgments. By this mode of expression, Solomon does not mean to limit God, as if he should never grant a deliverance, but when his people were deeply affected with the plagues of their hearts. But he mentions this as an argument with God, urging the exercise of his sympathy and compassion towards them, and the removal of his judgments, when they should be brought to a due sense of their sins. The expression may also intimate the line of duty, the way in which God's people are to expect, that their prayers shall be heard and answered.—This is only when they are humbled before him on account of their iniquities. Thus it declares to us, as it did to his ancient people, that those who address God's throne for deliverance from judgments, and are yet yet hardened in their sins, have no reason to expect that they shall receive the answer of prayer.—Nor does he mean to insinuate, that it could be supposed, that the throne of God should be so approached by all his people, as that every individual should know and be deeply affected with his own sins. For this is a case that never did, and we may venture to say, never will happen in any general reformation. But as he here points out what is the duty of every one in his approach to the mercy-seat, he also supposes what might be the attainment of a great many of these afflicted supplicants. Here an universal expression is used to denote a great, although it should not be the greatest part; of which we have many other examples in scripture. We have an expression of the very same import, used on the same subject, Ezek. vii. 16. All of them mourning, every one for his own iniquity.

The heart is taken in different senses in scripture. Sometimes, in a more general sense, it denotes the soul, with all its faculties, understanding, will, conscience, affections; and with all its adjuncts, as wisdom, prudence, thoughts, desires and wishes. More strictly, it signifies the will and affections; which are the most operative powers of the soul; the peculiar seat of desire or reluctance, of choice or rejection; and the immediate springs and principles of action. Here it may be proper to observe, that when we may afterwards speak of the heart, or any particular plague of it, we shall generally understand it in the first of these senses, as denoting all the faculties of the soul; and do not mean to confine ourselves to a nice philosophical discussion of the different faculties as the subjects of different sins. Although sin has eminently its seat in the will and affections; yet we may speak of it in its influence on both the superior and inferior faculties, under the general denomination of the heart; by which they are so often collectively expressed in scripture. By the plague here mentioned, we understand sin. There are some indeed who apply this expression to the particular affliction or judgment, to which either individuals, or the nation in general, might be subjected; and in confirmation of this opinion, adduce the parallel passage in 2 Chron. vi. 29. where the words run in the following manner; When every one shall know his own sore, and his own grief.—But it must be observed, that the difference here principally depends on the translation: for the same word, there rendered sore, is in this place rendered plague. Although there is another expression added,—and his own grief; yet this will by no means restrict the force of the preceding one to affliction: because sin should be much more the subject of our grief than any affliction; as every affliction derives its essence, sting and bitterness from sin; and as the cause should naturally be considered before the effect, or at least, the cause should principally engage our attention*. Besides, affliction in general, and particularly any outward stroke, such as those mentioned in the preceding verse, cannot be denominated the plague of the heart, with such propriety as sin. Afflictions of this kind are more properly the plague of the flesh, and can only be that of the heart in a derivative and secondary way. The proper and original sense of the word rendered plague, seems also in this place to restrict it peculiarly to sin. For the word used in the original properly signifies any evil of a contagious and abominable nature. Now, although the word, when used with respect to the pestilence, or any outward calamity, may bear this sense; yet when the heart is spoken of as the seat of this plague, we must necessarily understand it of sin: for this alone, in a spiritual sense, as affecting the heart, and especially as seated in it, is of a contagious and abominable nature; and
the

 this

* The Psalmist uses the same figurative mode of expression, Psal. cxxxix. 24. See if there be any way of pain, or grief in me, as in the margin. In the text, it is with propriety rendered any wicked way, because the connection evidently limits the phrase to sin, the source and procuring cause of all pain or grief.

this cannot with propriety be said of any outward disease, because of its effects on the heart, in producing grief or affliction. The same word here rendered plague, as signifying a disease of an infectious nature, is often used in this proper and original sense in scripture. It often denotes the plague of leprosy, which was considered as so infectious and abominable, that not only the garment which the leper wore, but the very house in which he dwelt, was unclean. It signifies the pestilence, as in verse 37. It is also used to express diseases, which are contagious and loathsome. So in Psal. xxxviii. 11. David complains, that his friends stood aloof from his sore, or from his plague; which he had described before as a loathsome disease that filled his loins with pain. Now, these different uses of the word, according to its strict and primary sense, as denoting an abominable and infectious evil, illustrate the necessity of understanding the plague of the heart in reference to sin; because this, as affecting the heart, may, with much more propriety than any thing else, be called a plague.

THAT we are to understand this expression of sin, and not of affliction, at least of sin in a peculiar manner, and only of affliction subordinately, as the fruit of sin, seems undeniably evident from the words of Solomon recorded in verse 39. Give to every man according to his ways, whose HEART thou knowest; for thou even thou only knowest the HEARTS of the children of men. This solemn appeal to God, as the Searcher of hearts, must certainly determine the plague formerly mentioned, as seated in the heart, to be sin. The appeal here made refers to his infinite knowledge of this plague, and their exercise under it. For if it must be limited, or principally referred to any temporal calamity, there was no occasion for an appeal to Omniscience; because any temporal calamity of such a nature as those specified, would not only be obvious to it, but to every indifferent spectator. The connection that is also stated between

between the ways and the heart of the person in this supposed situation, as intimating that whatever knowledge a man might have of his heart, if it did not influence his ways; or what strictness of conduct soever a man might attain, if it did not proceed from a true knowledge of the plague of his heart, would be unacceptable with God; clearly demonstrates that the plague here mentioned is meant of sin. Indeed the connection farther stated between the uprightnes of a man's heart, as influencing his conduct, or the holiness of a man's conduct as proceeding from an upright heart, and God's gracious interposition in a time of calamity, is not to be considered as expressive of any thing meritorious, either in his practical knowledge, or holy practice, as entitling him to any blessing from God. For although the Old Testament Saints lived under a legal dispensation, still it was a dispensation of the same covenant that we are under, which proposes all its rewards as of grace, and not of debt. But this connection declares the ordinary course of God's operation, in averting afflictions, when by means of them he has brought his people to a sense of sin, and turned them to himself; as he chastens them not for his pleasure, but for their profit. It may also intimate, that although the Lord is often pleased, in his compassion and forbearance, for a time to remove judgments from guilty individuals or nations, in consequence of a reformation on their part, perhaps merely of an external kind, they nevertheless are only warranted to expect either a partial or total removal of judgments, when they turn unto him with their whole heart.

WHAT is farther proposed in opening these words is,

I. To make some observations mostly founded on the text. And,

II. To illustrate the necessity and importance of knowing the plague of the heart.

I. It is proposed to offer some observations.

It may be observed then,

I. THAT sin has all the evil qualities of a plague. It is of the most abominable nature ; therefore it may justly receive this appellation. Under the law, leprosy was pronounced to be a plague ; the leper was shut up by himself, by order of the priest ; and if his leprosy was confirmed, he was not suffered to enter the camp, but obliged to dwell alone in a separate habitation. This certainly, in a spiritual sense, represented the abominable nature of sin. He who labours under this plague, during the continuance of its power, is excluded from the presence of God, and from all communion with him. The sinner who is finally unbelieving and impenitent, who notwithstanding all the means he enjoys, so far from being cured, despises them all, like the incurable leper, is entirely cast without the camp, for ever separated from God, and from his people. Sin is unspeakably abominable to the holy God. Therefore he pleads with sinners, in the most tender and affectionate manner, that they would not commit it. Oh ! do not that abominable thing that I hate.—A plague is especially an inward distress. All its external eruptions, instead of constituting the disease itself, only declare its internal power, as infecting the whole mass of blood and humours, and rendering nature totally unfit for the performance of its proper functions. Thus sin, the plague of the heart, is especially an inward malady. All its loathsome appearances, in the conversation, instead of constituting the disease, are only its symptoms, as may be afterwards more fully illustrated.

Sin, like a plague, is also infectious ; and, indeed, the contagion of this plague is universal. From one man this fatal distemper hath been communicated, without a single exception, to every individual, in every successive generation of his descendants, according to the ordinary course of nature. Our first father hath sinned, and we have all born his iniquity.

iniquity. This is a plague that hath infected the whole man. External plagues affect the body alone; but this hath affected both soul and body: the soul in all its powers, and the body in all its members. *The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint. From the sole of the foot, even unto the head, there is no soundness in it; but wounds, and bruises, and putrefying sores: they have not been closed, neither bound up, neither mollified with ointment. As it is originally infectious, in the corruption of our whole nature, it is secondarily so by example. Men are not merely, by the depravity of their nature, incident to this plague. They do every thing in their power to increase its fatal symptoms, and to extend its ravages, by greedily pursuing all iniquity. Any natural plague, as affecting the body, communicates its own virulent nature to every thing within its reach, and turns it to rottenness and corruption. So doth sin. It not only impairs the whole nature of him who is under its dominion, but communicates pollution to all his actions. Those duties, that are in themselves good, become evil as performed by the sinner. The prayer of the wicked is abomination to the Lord.—Their solemn meetings are iniquity; their appointed feasts his soul hateth. Even their natural and civil actions are contaminated by this plague. The very plowing of the wicked is sin.

It is incurable as to all that man can do. No earthly means can remove the plague. Notwithstanding all the attempts of Naturalists to account for this disease upon physical principles, it has generally been considered by thinking persons, as more immediately, than any other, inflicted by the hand of God, and as a disease that could be removed by no human endeavours †. This is one reason why, under
the

* Isa. i. 5. 6.

† We are sure, from the testimony of Scripture, that this disease has been, in different instances, immediately inflicted by God's hand.

the law, the person infected with leprosy, or any other plague, was obliged to have immediate recourse to the priest *. So the plague of sin, although brought on man by himself, wherein the resemblance fails, is absolutely incurable, as to all that can be effected by the wisdom and power of creatures. Although this spiritual leper should wash himself with nitre, and take much soap, yet his iniquity would be marked before the Lord. Nothing but the infinitely precious blood of Christ can remove this plague.

It is also consuming and deadly. It is the nature of a plague to diffuse itself through the subject infected, and to corrupt and consume it †. Sin is the seed and principle of corruption in our nature; and if it be not removed, shall consume both soul and body. So the Psalmist confesses; My strength faileth because of mine iniquity, and my bones are consumed ‡. Therefore the Church also complains; Thou hast consumed us because of our iniquities §. Sin is the mortification of our natures. It not only subjects us to natural death, as part of the sentence of the broken law, and diffuses a principle of mortality through our bodies; but is also the spiritual mortification of our souls; for it subjects the immortal part to a spiritual mortality. This is presently discovered by the unfitness of all the powers of the soul for the service of God, which is their highest end and proper employment; by the loss of his image in original righteousness, and by hand. Particularly, there were two kinds of leprosy common among the Jews, which seem to have been utterly unknown among other nations, and which they, notwithstanding all their obstinacy, always viewed as the immediate fruits of Divine judgment. These were, the leprosy in garments, and in the walls of an house; by which we are not to understand any typical defilement; nor are we to view the ordinances about them as signifying the danger of conveying the infection from a leprous person; for these were two kinds of leprosy, spreading and corroding, distinct from each other, and totally different from a bodily leprosy. Vid. Univ. Hist. vol. iii. p. 157.—159.; Poli Synops. Crit. in Lev. xii. 47.

VOL. I.

H

the

* Lev. xiii. 2, 3, 5, &c. † Numb. xii. 12. ‡ Psa. xxxi. 10.

§ Isa. lxiv. 7.

the want of fellowship with him. It is finally discovered in that eternal death, which is especially the wages of sin, and in which the soul, in a spiritual sense, everlastingly endures consumption, corruption, and perdition, and yet never attains the wished-for destruction or annihilation.—The words of our text, viewed in their connection, afford a beautiful and striking contrast between the outward plague mentioned in ver. 37. and the inward one mentioned in ver. 38. ; as intimating, that whatever outward plague sinners may be under, there is still a more loathsome one within ; that how fatal soever the pestilence may be, which walketh in darknes, and wasteth at noon-day, it derives all its deadly power from the plague of the heart, which is, in its own nature, much more destructive ;—and as declaring, that whatever outward calamity overwhelms the children of men, they can never make a right improvement of it, unless they turn their eyes inward to that running sore of sin, that while their flesh may be loathsome to themselves, should make their souls much more so ; as it renders them unspeakably loathsome to God, and is the source of every thing else about them, which is evil or abominable.

2. SIN is with the greatest propriety denominated the plague of the heart. For it hath properly its seat here ; and it is the heart that defiles the whole conversation. The body, indeed, is active in sinning as well as the soul ; and for this reason subjected to the curse in conjunction with it. But then the body is only the tool of the soul in sinning. Therefore our members are said to be the instruments of unrighteousness unto sin. They are only the instruments : the soul is the principal agent, the primary director. The heart alone is the subject of will, choice, consent and approbation. The influence of the heart is therefore necessary to the being of all outward sin. The Apostle, indeed, declares, that with the mind he served the law of God, while with the flesh the law of sin *. But the flesh is not here to be understood of the body, but of the the unrenewed part of the man. This he opposes to his new nature, which alone he accounts worthy to be called his mind. Could we suppose an evil action to be committed without the smallest influence or consent of the mind, it would cease to be evil, it would altogether lose the nature of sin, which, in order to its being, as an external act, must have the consent of the will in some degree or other. Man, in this supposed case, could be no more accountable than the brute, which is entirely destitute of reason. But all sin has its first rise in the heart. The sin of our nature has its residence, nay, its reign there, before it be expressed by any open immorality. All outward sins spring from this as their fountain.

* Rom. vii. 25.

HERE we do not mean to insinuate, according to the doctrine of Papists, that the consent of the will is necessary to the essence of sin. For it is undeniable, that we are chargeable with innumerable thoughts, which, although they may not so far ripen in the secret chambers of imagery, as to receive the consent of the will, are yet sinful, and often exceedingly so; as proceeding from the exuberant corruption of the heart, all the imaginations of which are only evil continually *; as tending in themselves to open acts of wickedness; and as being of the nature of those inordinate motions of the heart, which the scripture calls covetousness or lust; and which the Apostle declares he would not have known to be sin, unless he had seen by the light of the Holy Spirit, that the law had expressly prohibited them †. To a carnal unenlightened mind the tenth commandment, delivered in these words, Thou shalt not covet, may appear to be unnecessary, as containing a material repetition of what is forbidden in the eighth. Paul, while the Pharisee, seems to have entertained some such unjust apprehension. But when the commandment came, he found even heart-sin to be exceeding sinful ‡: and every man who truly knows the plague of his own heart, must admire both the grace and holiness of God, manifested in the addition of this to all the other precepts of the moral ral law; viewing it as a necessary key for opening up the spiritual meaning and extensive application of all those preceding, which, in the manner of expression, being confined to the principal and overt acts of each of the sins referred to, would unavoidably, as to the matter of them also, by every carnal mind be confined to these. Even this most spiritual precept, with respect to the manner of expression, seems only to comprehend those actings of covetousness that regard our neighbour's property; which verbal limitation appeared, in the infinite wisdom of God, most suitable to the comparative darkness of the legal dispensation. Yet it must be evident to every mind led by the Spirit, that it clearly pronounces even the first motions and most secret risings of lust in the heart to be sin, whatever be the object to which they are directed; whether they regard the first or second table of the law; and though they be nowise indulged, but suppressed by grace. For a corrupt fountain can send forth nothing but bitter streams; and all such motions are directly opposed to that universal spirituality which the law requires.

* Gen. vi. 5.

† Rom. vii. 5.

‡ Rom. vii. 13.

EVEN outward sins may be committed without a formal consent of the will; such as those of ignorance, of surprise, and also of omission, when the neglect is not voluntary. Believers likewise do what they would not, what they hate. When, therefore, we speak of the consent of the will as necessary to outward sin, in some degree or other; all that we mean is, to express the constant influence of the heart on the life; and to illustrate the folly of those who think that their hearts may be pure, while their hands are not clean. For even in sins of ignorance, surprise and omission, there is a tacit and virtual consent; because either a man does not improve the means of light he enjoys; or he consents to sloth and carelessness, which are the occasions of his surprise or omission. The Christian also, although his mind, his will, as renewed, continues to disapprove and oppose known sin, yet consents with his will as far as it is carnal.

BUT

BUT not only has fin properly its seat in the heart ; but it is the fin of the heart that defiles the conversation. This is another evidence of the justness of that denomination given to it in our text. Were there no fin in the heart, there could be none in the practice. Our Saviour was harmless and undefiled in his conversation, without the least fin or defect, personal guilt or pollution of any kind ; because he was holy in his nature. This was the foundation of the innocence and blamelessness of his life. Had he not been the holy child Jesus, it could never have been said with regard to his life, that there was no guile found in his mouth. Thus the heart is the fountain of all defilement. It is the plague of the heart that infects the life. Our Lord was careful to inform his disciples of this. Do ye not perceive, said he, *that whatsoever thing from without entereth into the man, it cannot defile him. That which cometh out of the man, that defileth the man. For from within, out of the heart of man, proceed evil thoughts, &c. All these things come from within and defile the man. And again, A good man, out of the good treasure of his heart, bringeth forth that which is good ; and an evil man, out of the evil treasure of his heart, bringeth forth that which is evil ; for of the abundance of the heart, his mouth speaketh †.

3. EVERY man should be especially concerned about his own fin. He ought to make his own spiritual plague his peculiar study. There are a great many professors, who make a mighty outcry against the sins of others, against those of their neighbours, of their fellow-professors, of the nation in general, or of the age in which they live. They pretend to be deeply humbled on account of these sins. Yet they are entirely careless about their own. It is good to be duly and zealously affected with the sins of others. This is our indispensable duty ; because the glory of God is concerned in it. But all professions of sorrow for the sins of others are unavailing, false and hypocritical, unless they be attended with, or flow from

* Mark vii. 18.—23.

† Luke vi. 45.

from an affecting conviction of our own sin, and ingenuous sorrow before the Lord on this account. Such empty professions are like those of the obdurate Jews, who acknowledged themselves to be the children of them that had killed the prophets; and as a sort of reparation for the crimes of their fathers, built and garnished the sepulchres of these holy martyrs; while, after all, they were partakers with their fathers, in their evil deeds, because of their own unbelief, which instigated them to persecute Christ and his disciples. How preposterous is it for us to acknowledge that others are sinners, and that our fathers have sinned; unless we be deeply affected with our own guilt, and thence influenced to confess, in the bitterness of our hearts, that we have sinned with our fathers, and been too long the workers of iniquity *. While we acknowledge the sins of preceding generations, under a heartfelt conviction of that dishonour thereby done to God, and as deprecating the judgments thus entailed on us; we ought, in a particular manner, in our confessions, to recollect and enumerate their sins as aggravations of ours; because, according to the testimony of God in his word, their sins, with the judgments attending them, are set before our eyes as beacons to deter us from following their wicked example. This consideration seems to have been viewed and confessed by the returning Israelites, in different periods, as a peculiar aggravation of their guilt †. All the professions that we make of sorrow for the sins of others, are but a solemn insult offered to the omniscient and infinitely holy God, unless we have a just apprehension of our own sin; because we profess to be humbled before him for that which we are entirely ignorant of, as to its evil and abominable nature. It is a profession of sorrow for that which never occasioned to ourselves one moment of sorrow, or one tear of anguish. Yea, our profession of sorrow for the sins of others, while we remain insensible as to our own, is a great aggravation of our guilt, and enhancement of our condemnation. For when we

* Psal. cvi. 6.

† Ezra ix. 7.—Jer. iii. 25.

we declare our sense of the guilt of others, and are unaffected with our own, wherein we accuse others, we condemn ourselves, proclaim our obduracy, and declare that we are inexcusable. Where shall we find a resemblance of this hypocritical conduct? Shall we compare it to that of a man who joins himself to the company of those who have discovered, and are bitterly lamenting the murder of one of their relations or friends, who weeps as bitterly, and, to appearance, as sincerely as any of them; nay, earnestly wishes that the cruel murderer were discovered; and, to his professions of grief, adds the most poignant invectives, even denounces the severest threatenings, and imprecates the heaviest curses on the guilty person; while he is himself the murderer, or an accessory to the crime?

4. EVERY man should especially search into the sins of his heart. Therefore Solomon interrupts the tenor of his address to God by this striking parenthesis; who shall know every man the plague of his own heart. It is not enough that we know our own plague. We must be peculiarly concerned about that of our heart. Knowledge of this kind is to us of the greatest importance. This appears from what we have already seen, that the heart is the proper seat of sin, and that it is this which defiles the man. He who is a stranger to his heart, can never know the multitude of evils that compass him about, and that he is ever in danger of falling into. For the heart of every man hath in it the seeds of all sin. There every iniquity, however atrocious, lies as it were in embryo; and that all men do not follow courses equally wicked with those of the worst, is not because their hearts are naturally better than others, but is principally owing, either to the restraining, or to the renewing grace of God. Every human heart is a spiritual Babylon, *a hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird. Therefore the Spirit of God represents the heart of man as de-

Sperately

* Rev. xviii. 2.

*ſperately wicked; not wicked in ſome, but in the higheſt degree. This expreſſion properly ſignifies any diſeaſe ſo inveterate as to baffle all the force of medicine, a diſeaſe abſolutely incurable; and when uſed metaphorically to denote the wickedneſs of man's heart, it intimates that this is ſo great, that all human expedients, all the exertions of natural ability, all the powers of man's reaſon or will are utterly inſufficient to remove it, or of themſelves to withſtand its increaſing force; that with regard to all that man can do, the wickedneſs of the heart is a deſperate caſe; that it is a diſeaſe which nothing but ſovereign grace and almighty power can conquer.

MAN hath been ſometimes called a microcoſm or little world. He hath been thus denominatèd in a phyſical ſenſe, becauſe of the wonderful nature of his frame, in which all the principles diſperſed through the reſt of the univerſe are collected and combined: but this designation moſt properly belongs to him in a moral ſenſe, and particularly to his heart. This is, indeed, a world in miniature. As all the accounts of robberies and murders, of perjuries, treaſons and rebellions, of wars and deſtroyations, are only narratives of the particular operations of inward corruption: the heart itſelf is a compend of the hiſtory of mankind from the fall to this very moment. It diſcovers, at leaſt in the ſeed and principle, all thoſe luſts that have produced ſo much miſchief among the children of Adam. Here you may diſcern that Deceit, which hath ſo often ruined, not individuals only, but empires; that Avarice, which hath ranſacked the bowels of the earth, and fathomed the abyſſes of the ocean for its gratifications, nay, ſacrificed whole nations to its golden idol; that Ambition, which hath at times brought greater deſtroyation on mankind than all the diſeaſes to which our fallen nature is ſubject. Here you may perceive the workings of that Cruelty, which hath rendered man a greater monſter, in the deſtroyation of his own ſpecies, than any beaſt of prey; that Senſuality, which hath converted him into a greater

* Jer. xvii. 9.

greater brute than any of those whose spirit goeth downward; that Unbelief which made him crucify the Lord of glory; and that Atheism, that hath made him deny the being of his Creator. Even in the same heart, according to the variation of age, circumstances and temptations, you may discern the motions of almost all those lusts that engage the world at large, and, for near six thousand years, have kept it lying in the wicked one. It is deemed a peculiar excellency in an historian, if he clearly points out the secret springs of those actions which he narrates. But how accurately soever a man should describe the conduct of nations, and unravel the mysteries of their politics; if he knows not the mystery of iniquity in his own heart, he wants that key which can alone admit him to a just view of the treasures of wickedness, and discover to him the true origin and nature of those enormities that he describes. Could a man fairly read his own heart, by the light of the Word and Spirit, it would afford him a just and compendious history of the world. He would find the history of Cain abridged in his own Anger and Revenge; of Pharaoh in his Obduracy; of Balaam in his Covetousness; of David and Bathsheba in his Filthiness of Spirit; of Absalom in his Disobedience; of Rehoboam in his Self-confidence; of Nebuchadnezzar in his Vanity; of Sennacherib in his Ambition; of Rabshakeh in his Presumption; of Ahab, Jezebel and Manasseh in his Enmity against God; of Judas in his Deceitfulness; of the Heathen nations in his Ignorance and Blindness of mind; and of the Church of Israel in his Unbelief and Rebellion. It is granted, indeed, that all these corruptions do not rage with equal violence in the same heart, or break out in the conversation. But, at one time or another, a man, who is acquainted with himself, will find the workings of every one of these in a greater or less degree. And how could he find their motions, however secret or imperfect, if the principle of each of them did not reside in his heart*?

VOL. I.

I

Thus,

* In one point of view the heart of the Christian is a more striking

Thus, without the knowledge of the heart, a man can never have a just apprehension of the evil nature of sin. This, indeed, is mournfully displayed by the dreadful effects of inward depravity which appear in the enormities of the life, like so many empoisoned streams rushing from a deadly fountain. But all the enormities of the life, dreadful as they are in many instances, are still insufficient to declare the full malignity of the nature of sin. This is an original found only in the heart, that no external representation, however striking the resemblance, can perfectly express. In the heart of man, in his natural condition, sin sits enthroned as a sovereign, gives forth laws for the whole of his conduct, employs an unspeakable variety of lusts as the executioners of its determinations, and retains all the powers of the soul, and all the members of the body as its abject slaves and devoted emissaries. Notwithstanding the shocking outbreakings of corruption, and flagrant impieties that issue from the heart; we have but a mere sample of what is within. And if these outbreakings are so shocking, these impieties so flagrant, if the wickedness of the heart discovers itself in so striking striking miniature of the world than even that of the natural man. His corruptions, indeed, are not so powerful; but they all exist in the principle. Besides, there is the vigorous opposition of grace. Here we have, on a small scale, a representation of all the politics of the great world. We discern the workings of that wisdom which is devilish, which employs greater political subtleties than were ever brought into action among men; and of that also which is from above, endeavouring to counterplot the other, although without hypocrisy. Here we find corruption daringly proclaiming war against the soul, and against that divine principle which resides in it; and grace proclaiming war against corruption; the flesh lusting against the spirit, and the spirit lusting against the flesh. You see them actually engaged on the field of battle; legions of lusts, aided by their auxiliaries, legions of devils, struggling against the hidden man of the heart, and his various graces. For what will you see in the Shulamite? as it were the company of two armies. In a word, you may perceive sometimes the one and sometimes the other victorious; the new creature lifted up and cast down again. The Christian is the true Gad. A troop shall overcome him; but he shall overcome at the last.

striking a manner, although man is restrained by the bonds of society, by the force of human laws, by regard to his character and interest, by the terrors of conscience, by desires of happiness, by the fears of a future state, and by the common operations of the Spirit; what a dreadful discovery would the heart make of itself, were it freed from all these restraints? Were it possible that the most wicked man in the world could take a naked view of his heart, could see it stripped of all the false glosses that he puts on his crimes, of all the restraints to which they are subjected, and of all the ideal virtues and artificial refinements, which he considers as an ample indemnification for his vices; he would shudder at himself, start back from the dreadful picture with horror and amazement, and imagine that it was rather the representation of a devil, than of a man. If a Saint of God, whose nature had been renewed by the power of the Holy Spirit, whose lusts had been mortified, in whom the dominion of sin had been broken, and a principle of holiness implanted, on a discovery of his own heart, with all these advantages, could cry out; *Behold, I am vile, what shall I answer thee; if another, on the same discovery, although not behind the chief of the Apostles, was made to acknowledge that he was the chief of sinners†; what must the wickedness of the heart of man be, in its full force and dominion, as it appears in the eyes of the omniscient God!

WE learn, from what hath now been said, the dreadful ravages that sin has made in our nature. It has degraded man, who was once the resemblance of his Maker, into the likeness of the beasts that perish. It has made man, the lord of the creation, more vile than the vilest of the brute creatures, which were given him as his subjects. It has changed the image of God into the image of Satan, converted the sanctuary of God into a kennel of lusts, the friend of Jehovah into his enemy, the son of God into the child

of

* Job xl. 4.

† 1 Tim. i. 15.

of Beelzebub. From this consideration, be exhorted to take a view of the guilt and vileness of your nature, and of the unspeakable wickedness of your hearts. If the heavens are not clean in his sight, if he hath put no trust in his holy ones, if he charged his angels with folly; may we not justly exclaim, How much more abominable and filthy is man, who drinketh up iniquity like water! As children of the first Adam, you are children of wrath; and doubly so, as sinners by many actual transgressions. Thus, you are not only exposed to temporal death, which is the greatest extent of any natural plague; but while ye continue under sin, by the power of this spiritual plague, subject to, and lying under an awful sentence of spiritual death, being destitute of original righteousness, of the love of God, communion with him, and conformity to him. For as a plague wastes the natural beauty of man, the plague of sin hath consumed your beauty like a moth. Nay, you are also exposed to eternal death: and what this is, in its full meaning and extent, who can declare? The enlarged capacities of damned spirits, and even the superior powers of devils themselves, together with all their experience of suffering, can never be able to express the dreadful nature of that condemnation, which consists in their being punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power! No man can form just conceptions of natural death, but he who has felt its stroke. But this sting of death, this eternal death, although it may be felt, yet cannot be described even by its miserable subjects. Who knoweth the power of thine anger? Blessed are they who know it only, by its glorious contrast, in the fruits of everlasting love! This view of the detestableness and guilt of sin should influence you to seek a discovery of the Saviour. This is your consolation, that his name is called JESUS, because he saves his people from their sins. He superabundantly restores all that man hath lost by the fall. There is value in his blood, fully commensurate to all the demerit merit of your sin ; and he is able to save them to the uttermost, that come unto God by him.

THIS subject affords a decisive test, by which you may know, whether you are still under the absolute power of the plague of sin? Have you hitherto confined your views of sin, and your sorrow for it, to the outward man? Have you never pursued this enemy into the secret recesses of the heart, where it lurks like a lion in his den? Have you been grieved for the sins of your life and conversation, but ready to overlook or excuse the secret thoughts of wickedness, which lodge within you? Or, if you have been grieved for these as sinful and dishonouring to God, when indulged by you; yet have you never reviewed the first motions of the heart towards sin, as really sinful in themselves; have you never considered these corrupt figments of the heart, in their abominable nature and wicked tendency? Then, you need not be in the least hesitation to conclude, that you are yet strangers to the sinfulness of sin, and to your own hearts; and that the fatal plague is consuming you within, however its external wounds may be smoothed over by a conversation generally blameless. You are in no better situation than Paul before his conversion; perhaps in a situation not so good. For touching the outward righteousness of the law he was blameless; although, like you, he was ignorant of the nature and evil of secret lust.—We do not say, that all who are convinced, that the secret motions and first risings of sin in the heart are sinful, or who make a profession of sorrow for them, are really delivered from the power of sin; for convictions may go very far. But we are certain, that none can habitually view these as sinful, because of their opposition to the infinite holiness of God, can have them as their daily burden and grief at the throne of grace, and be still striving in the strength of Christ, to resist and subdue them,—but those who are savingly acquainted with the plague of the heart.

S E R M O N IV.

ON KNOWING THE PLAGUE OF THE HEART.

I KINGS viii. 38.

—Who shall know every man the plague of his own heart.—

ALL the knowledge that a man can, by any means, acquire, is utterly unprofitable, if he know not himself; and all his self-knowledge is equally unprofitable, if it be not practical. But alas! how many learned fools are there in the world, who know a great deal, and yet know nothing as they ought to know; who, in some sense, have all knowledge, and yet are nothing; because they are strangers to themselves, and of consequence strangers to God. For the saving knowledge of God, and that of ourselves, are inseparably connected, and have a mutual influence on each other. As the sun, when he appears in the natural world, by affording so striking a contrast between light and darkness, excites in the mind the most just ideas of the horror of that universal night which preceded his rising; and on the other hand, as the horror of this darkness most effectually demonstrates the inestimable value of his light: in like manner, a saving discovery of God, by means of the word, invariably tends to display to us our own hearts in their just and natural colours; and a saving discovery of our hearts will certainly recommend the infinite excellency and perfections of God.

On this subject we have already observed, that sin hath all the evil qualities of a plague; that it is with the greatest justness and propriety, denominated the plague of the heart; that a man should be in a particular ticular manner concerned about his own sins; and that the sins of the heart especially require our attention. We now proceed to observe,

5. THAT every man has some sin more prevalent in his heart than any other. Therefore the plague of the heart is mentioned in the singular number, as especially referring to this predominant sin. The Apostle calls it *the sin that doth so easily beset us. The prevalence of one sin above every other in a man's heart, may be owing to his natural constitution, to his temper, or to his situation in life, and its attendant temptations. We cannot, indeed, say with some, who, from ill-guided zeal against the Pelagian heresy, have gone to an extreme on the other side, that original sin is of the substance of the soul. Yet it must be acknowledged, that our nature is so contaminated by it, that this bitter root is as it were interwoven with our very frame. We shall not pretend to assign the natural causes of that great variety of constitutions to be found among men. But it is a fact beyond dispute, that the very temperament of the body has great influence on the qualities of the mind; and that this, according to its variations, produces a peculiar tendency to some sins more than to others. As this is one principal source of the diversity of tempers among men, so also of the different attachments to different lusts. Owing to this, some have a powerful bias to pride or passion; others to revenge and ferocity; and others again to the lust of the flesh in its various branches, to uncleanness, gluttony, drunkenness, or the like. Custom may have great influence. But as the habits of sin are not like many others, which are properly the consequences of repeated acts, but on the contrary, are their causes and springs; it must be granted, that, in most cases, where particular habits are deeply confirmed, they may be traced up to a constitutional tendency.—The temper, whether forward or timid, social or reserved, gentle or austere, calm or fiery, exposes a person to the commission miffion of fins that are nearly connected with each of thefe difpofitions.—The fituation in life hath alfo very great influence in this refpect. Different ranks in fociety and employments in life have different fins, or temptations peculiar to them, or more intimately connected with them, to which thofe who occupy them are exceedingly expofed.

* Heb. xii. 1.

Now, this predominant fin may, with the greateft propriety, by way of diftinction, be denominated the plague of the heart. For although every fin is entitled to this character, that of which we now fpeak, is fo in a fuperlative fenfe; becaufe it prefides in the heart as corrupt, and principally infects and contaminates the converfation. While a man continues under the abfolute power of this iniquity, it very often characterifes him in life, and marks, in a ftriking manner, every part of his conduct. According to its peculiar nature, he is efteemed avaricious, luftful, or ambitious; vain, proud, cruel, or deceitful. This prevalent fin may be viewed, either as it is found in a natural man, or in one renewed by grace. In the natural man it appears in its proper form, without any changes or difguifes whatfoever; or with thofe only that are enforced by fecondary confiderations. But in a renewed perfon, the prevalent fin of the heart often turns itfelf into a new channel; fo that it is not difcovered with fo much eafe as it was formerly. The predominant principle of pride will, after converfion, appear as legality, and in this fhape harafs the believer: for what is legality or felf-righteoufnefs, but juft the natural pride of the heart difguifed, or terminating upon God as its object rather than man? Obftinacy of temper will often difcover itfelf in the exercife of a Christian, in the fin of unbelief. Ambition will affume the name of fpiritual pride. A rafh forward temper will break out in felf-confidence. Doubting and defpondency will often mark the exercife of thofe who are naturally fearful or jealous. We do not here pretend to lay down a general rule, or to affert, that univerfal experience declares, that the predominant

dominant sins of renewed persons undergo a change as to their objects. For although, in all believers, the reigning power of every lust is subdued, often the same lust operates in them in the same manner as before conversion, however different the degree of its operation. Nor can it be with any shadow of justice affirmed, that any sins, appearing more openly in their unregenerate state, afterwards discover themselves under the form of unbelief or legality; as if these sins had been strangers to their hearts before. For it must be evident, that these very sins formerly exercised a dominion, now destroyed. But surely it is not going too far to affirm, that lusts destroyed as to their power, often deviate into another channel; and that those which openly appeared in the conversation, afterwards operate more secretly in the heart, and eminently influence the Christian's exercise towards God.

It is evident, that Peter was naturally of a very forward temper; and after he had been effectually called, how often did he discover this disposition, by trusting to his own wisdom or strength? In general, the distinguishing features of one's temper, according to the natural constitution, most powerfully characterise the whole conduct after conversion, whether good or bad; and those affections, which are especially discovered in a natural state, appear either to advantage or disadvantage, after a gracious change. For grace does not altogether remove the natural affections of any man, or in general entirely alter their constitutional peculiarities; but subdues them in as far as they are sinful, or, when their nature is such as to admit of it, communicates a new and holy propensity. The same affection of zeal that hurried Paul, while in his Pharisaical state, to the greatest extremities against Christ, when rectified by the power of the Holy Spirit, distinguished him from all the other Apostles, by his unequalled diligence in the service of his Lord. The same forward temper, which, when left to itself, plunged Peter into the most shameful self-confidence; as sanctified by grace, and under the direction of the Spirit, made him generally precede his brethren in confessing Christ, and surpass them all in the boldness and sublimity of his confessions. The beloved disciple's natural warmth of affections eminently appears in his renewed state, by his great attainments in the grace of Christian love. Indeed, there have been, and may be instances of persons once under the absolute predominancy of a particular corrupt affection, who, after conversion, have been less under the power of it, than of any other. For the Lord works in his children in a manner entirely sovereign, uses various methods of operation, and does not confine himself to any fixed rule. But we imagine, that the case referred to is very rare, and will seldom occur where there is not an eminent degree of sanctification.

6. EVERY man ought to be peculiarly acquainted with his predominant sin. This seems to be especially meant in the words of our text, who shall know every man THE PLAGUE of his own heart. This is peculiarly necessary, because it is by this sin, that we most frequently dishonour God, wound our consciences, mar our own comfort, and hinder our progress in religion; and it is this that most forcibly hurries on the sinner to every excess of riot. The predominant sin is Satan's strong hold in the heart. With this he is particularly acquainted. He hath too much discernment not to know what sin most easily besets each of us, far better than we ourselves do: and he hath paid particular attention to all the means, occasions and circumstances which lead to the commission of it. While he hath this under his direction, he is less concerned about our other iniquities. He well knows, that this is the weak side of every man, but especially of the believer; and he most frequently attacks him here. Those sins that are not so firmly rooted in the heart, as being less agreeable to the temper, constitution or situation of Christians, are less under Satan's influence. They have far less inclination to them than to this; and therefore with regard to them, temptation is not felt felt so powerful. Or perhaps these are mortified in a greater degree than their predominant sin, which, as being more agreeable to their natures as men, has a much stronger hold of them. Our endeavours to mortify other corruptions, if we neglect this, if we be not principally concerned about it, and watchful over it, will be as fruitless as the feeble attempts of a foolish general, who, in besieging a city, should turn his whole attention to the outposts, without giving himself any trouble about the main strength; or who, in endeavouring to obstruct the course of a river, should pay more attention to the smaller streams than to that which contains the force of the waters. We find that the exercise of the saints has been always in an eminent degree directed towards the mortification of this sin. Therefore, in the words formerly mentioned, the Apostle exhorts the Hebrews in this manner; *Laying aside every weight, and the sin that doth so easily beset us, let us run with patience the race that is set before us. The Christian life is here described by language borrowed from a race. He calls them to lay aside every weight, in imitation of the runners, who used to cast their cloaks and every part of their dress that could anywise encumber them. Our sins in general may be meant by the metaphorical expression, every weight; as the sin which doth so easily beset us denotes that particular corruption which hath such strength in the heart, as to be peculiarly its plague. It is said to beset us, because like any unseen obstruction that would precipitate him who runs in a race, this powerful lust is still ready to overturn the spiritual runner, or, according to the idea naturally conveyed by the word, to throw him headlong. The Psalmist was peculiarly engaged in mortifying that sin to which he was most subject. This he distinguishes by the appellation of his iniquity. I was also upright before him, and I kept myself from MINE iniquity †. He likewise calls it by way of eminence, the great transgression. Keep back thy servant also from presumptuous presumptuous sins ; let them not have dominion over me. Then shall I be upright, and I shall be innocent from the GREAT transgression.*

* Heb. xii. 1.

† Psal. xviii. 23.

7. THE knowledge of the heart is attended with great difficulty. The heart is an hidden thing. It therefore requires searching. The frequency of the calls given us in the word to this exercise, clearly intimates the difficulty of the work. As the heart is not obvious to the natural eye ; as little will it be obvious to a superficial observer.—This species of knowledge is attended with great difficulty, because of the deceitfulness of the heart. It eludes our examination, and exhibits a false portrait of itself. Where there is nothing but folly, it presents us with the appearance of wisdom ; where there is naught but impotence, it pleads the greatest ability ; where ignorance reigns, it pretends to superior attainments in knowledge ; where all is deceit, it imposes upon us a feigned integrity ; and amidst the rage of unsubdued lusts, it claims an eminent degree of holiness.—The power of self-love is another source of that difficulty attending the knowledge of the heart. We survey it with a partial eye. As it presents a false shew to us, we are willing to be imposed on ; we are chargeable with wilful blindness ; we obstinately shut our eyes against the light, and are really afraid to admit it. Indeed, the natural man does not merely survey his own heart with a partial eye. For, strictly speaking, in a spiritual sense, we are blind, we are as if we had no eyes. And as a man, naturally blind, can have no idea of colours ; as little can he, who is spiritually blind, discern the true and native complexion of his heart.—The difficulty attending this knowledge is greatly increased by the activity of Satan, who throws a mist over the eyes of the natural man, and does every thing in his power to exclude the light. For his kingdom is the kingdom of darkness ; and as long as his subjects continue ignorant of their hearts, there is no danger of their being alienated from his service. As he exerts himself to the

* Psa. xix. 13.

the utmost to hinder finners from knowing their own hearts; he is not satisfied with preventing as far as possible this important discovery. He endeavours artfully to persuade them, that matters are all right, that they need give themselves no anxiety about eternity; nay, that they are absolutely certain of life everlasting.

8. THIS knowledge is attainable. Solomon plainly supposes this in these words, who SHALL know. Were not this the case, the duty of searching the heart would not be so frequently and earnestly inculcated. Therefore when it is said, *Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves; know ye not your own selves? Let us search and try our ways, and turn to the Lord†; we are to consider these as so many declarations, not merely of our duty, but of the attainableness of this knowledge. This indeed is the real attainment of all believers. They receive a just and affecting discovery of their hearts, according to the characters that God hath given them. We find Solomon himself emphatically expressing his convictions on this subject, in the following question; Who can say, I have made my heart clean, I am pure from my sin‡?

9. THE saving knowledge of the heart flows only from the operation of the Spirit. Before the heart has been the subject of his saving influences, not only does it remain under the full power of its natural wickedness; but the sinner, its miserable subject, continues grossly ignorant of its deplorable situation. Convictions of sin and terrors of conscience may have a temporary effect in discovering to him his wickedness, but these are generally occasioned by outward acts. He may be, in some measure, affected with a sense of the wickedness of the sin particularly committed. But even this sense proceeds from secondary considerations only, such as the injury it does to himself, or to society. He is not at all affected with a sense of the wickedness of his heart;
or

* 2 Cor. xiii. 5.

† Lam. iii. 40.

‡ Prov. xx. 9.

or if he feel any thing like this, it is effaced by the first temptation. The sinner may, like the wicked Ahab, go softly * for a time; but he is entirely unacquainted with the exercise and resolution of good Hezekiah, which he thus expresses: What shall I say? He hath both spoken unto me, and himself hath done it: I shall go softly all my years in the bitterness of my soul †. Indeed it is the last conclusion that a natural man wishes to draw from the sin of his life, that his heart is wicked. He will charge his sin upon the power of temptation; or foolishly suppose some kind of fatality attending him; or even impiously presume to accuse God as the author of it, rather than impute it to his idol-heart as its source. But the holy Spirit discovers the hearts of sinners to themselves. This is his peculiar province. He shall convince the world of sin. And he shews them their inward wickedness; for he convinces them of the sin of unbelief; and this, you know, hath its seat in the heart: He shall convince the world of sin,—because they believe not ‡. So the Psalmist addresses Christ in relation to his work by the Spirit; Thine arrows are sharp in the heart of the king's enemies; whereby the people fall under thee §. The hearts of all are equally under his power. Even the king's heart is in the hand of the Lord, as the rivers of water, he turneth it whithersoever he will. This discovery he makes to sinners by means of the Word. This is the instrument which the Spirit employs in opening up to them those wounds and diseases in their own hearts, to which they were formerly strangers. For the word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart . The law is the immediate mean of this discovery: for the Spirit brings home the law on the conscience, manifesting its purity, perfection perfection and extent. Thus sin appears to be exceeding sinful; and when the commandment comes in this way, the sinner dies to all his apprehensions of the goodness, innocence and purity of his heart. The word of God is the glass in which he obtains a just view of himself; and the holy Spirit shining on the word, and thence into the heart, is that light which enables him to obtain it.

* 1 Kings, xxi. 27. † Isa. xxxviii. 15. ‡ John xvi. 8, 9.
 § Psal. xlv. 5.  Heb. iv. 12.

BUT it must be remembered, that what discovery soever the sinner obtain of his sin by means of the law, it can be of no saving benefit to him, if it proceed no farther, if the love of God in Christ be not efficaciously manifested, and shed abroad in the heart. For all the self-knowledge that a man can attain, unless it be the fruit of the Spirit's gracious operation, is entirely unconnected with salvation. A person may, in this respect, be taught of the Spirit in a common manner, and yet eternally perish. He may, by the power of the Word on his conscience, and by the terrors of the law, discover, in some measure, that his heart is full of wickedness, that he is abominable to the holy God, that he is exposed to his wrath and curse; and after all be a castaway: because this knowledge, as it is not the fruit of the Spirit, working in a saving and converting manner on his heart, is entirely different in its nature and effects. There are these great distinctions between that knowledge which flows from the common operation of the Spirit, and that which is the fruit of his saving operation;—between that knowledge which is consistent with a state of condemnation, and that which certainly demonstrates a state of justification. By the former, a man especially sees the wickedness of his heart as destructive. In consequence of the latter, he chiefly views it as detestable. The first is found in a person, while his love to sin is unimpaired; but the second is always attended by an abhorrence of sin. The retaining of sin in the practice is compatible with the one; while the other invariably produces the renunciation of every iniquity, how dear
soever

soever to corrupt nature. The knowledge of sin, by the common work of the Spirit, proceeds from the fear of God as a judge and an enemy: but that knowledge, which is the fruit of his saving work, from the love of God as a father and a friend. Whenever a man becomes truly acquainted with the plague of his heart, he immediately endeavours to mortify and destroy it. There is the same difference between those who know their hearts in a common way, and those who know them savingly, as there was between the Israelites, who in the wilderness were stung by the fiery serpents, and consumed by their poison, because they improved not the remedy, and those who, knowing that the brazen serpent was held up to them, turned their eyes to it and were healed. Those who are enlightened by the Spirit only in a common way, though they may have some conviction of their plague, yet, by reason of unbelief, still remain under its power. But those who are savingly enlightened, are enabled by faith to look to Him who was typified by the brazen serpent; and thus they are delivered from their plague.

10. A saving knowledge of the plague of the heart includes a true sense of its evil. If our sense of sin proceed no farther than a knowledge, belief, and dread of its consequences, as it exposes us to eternal destruction; we are like a man who knows no more about the disease he is infected with, than that by means of it he is in danger of death; but is entirely ignorant of its name, nature, and distinguishing symptoms. If we know the plague of the heart aright, we will have a deep and affecting sense of its evil, as opposed to the nature, law, government, holiness, and love of God, especially as manifested in Christ; and as depriving us of his image, and making us the children of Satan. But on these things we do not particularly insist, having endeavoured to illustrate them formerly. We have no due sense of sin, unless we really see it to be a plague, not only as consuming to our nature, but as abominable, infectious and incurable by any means in the power of the creature. He would be ignorant indeed, who had no other idea of a confirmed leprosy, than as outwardly deforming his body; without knowing that it defiled the whole mass of blood, and affected the very springs of animal life. And shall we not account him grossly ignorant of the nature of sin, who views it only as defiling his conversation, but has no just apprehension of the heart as its principal seat, of his being destitute of original righteousness; and understands not that all the leprous spots which appear in his life, proceed from the contamination of all the powers of his soul? A just sense of sin imports a conviction that every imagination of the thoughts of the heart is only evil continually. It is not so much the blots of the conversation that humble the spiritual leper, who truly knows his disease, as a discovery of his inward defilement; which is so obstinate, that all outward washings can as little remove it, as water externally applied, could naturally remove a confirmed leprosy.

II. THE knowledge here referred to implies hatred of this plague, and loathing of self on account of it. The Psalmist appeals to God, as to his hatred of every wicked way. It is matter of promise: *Then shall ye remember your own evil ways, and your doings that were not good, and shall loathe yourselves in your own sight, for your iniquities and for your abominations. This was the attainment of Job, when the Lord answered him out of the whirlwind; I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eye seeth thee. Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes †. Under the law, it was commanded with respect to the leper, in whom the plague was, that his clothes should be rent and his head bare, and that he should put a covering upon his upper lip, and cry, Unclean, unclean ‡. We cannot imagine why the law of leprosy should be so strict, and the whole process in the case of this plague be so particularly appointed of God; if it was not

VOL. I.

L

* Ezek. xxxvi. 31.

† Job xlii. 5, 6.

‡ Lev. xiii. 45.

not that this loathsome disease is so striking a representation of the nature and effects of sin, as it is unquestionably its bitter fruit ; and that God was pleased to mark it out, in so uncommon a manner, as a peculiar emblem of these. The two first circumstances here enjoined were tokens of sorrow, and intimate to us, that all who truly know the plague of sin will be deeply affected with its evil. The next circumstance of a covering upon the lip, seems to have typified the infectious nature of sin ; as if the very breath of the leper had carried contagion in it. He was also to cry, Unclean, unclean. This not only signifies that filth which is in sin, the leprosy of the soul, but that all who know it savingly, have a deep and affecting sense of their defilement, and loathe themselves on this account. The same expression is used by the Prophet Isaiah, when he saw the Lord high and lifted up. Then he said, Wo is me, for I am undone, for I am a man of UNCLEAN lips *. The use of these words on this occasion is an infallible commentary on the type ; and clearly proves, that their proper and spiritual application is only to the plague of the heart. The Church makes materially the same confession elsewhere : We are all as an unclean thing †. The leper must certainly have been loathsome to himself, when cast out of the camp, and separated from the society of others. Even his own company would be burdensome ; because every thing about him, and around him, perpetually reminded him of his filthiness. In like manner, every sinner, who really knows his own plague, must appear to himself vile, loathsome and detestable.

12. THIS saving knowledge of the heart is matter of promise. The promise is to the sinful creature a rich supply of all that he wants, an inexhaustible treasure of strength for obedience to the commandment, and an unceasing ground of comfort in every duty, and under every trial. Whatever the sinner is insufficient to perform, whatever the soul indispensably requires, whatever the precept enjoins,—the promise amply contains contains and freely exhibits. As it contains medicine for every disease, balm for every wound, healing for every plague to which the heart is liable; it also secures the gracious discovery of all these diseases, wounds, or plagues, which would otherwise consume us without being known. Therefore it is said; Then SHALL they remember their own evil ways. And again, The heart of the rash shall understand knowledge. It is written in the prophets, and they shall be all taught of God. Remarkable to this purpose are the words of God by Ezekiel*. I will establish my covenant with thee, and thou SHALT know that I am the Lord:—THAT thou mayst remember, and be confounded, and never open thy mouth any more because of thy shame, when I am pacified toward thee, for all that thou hast done, saith the Lord God. The declaration that the Lord made to the same Prophet, when he took him in vision to behold the wickedness committed in the temple at Jerusalem, he fulfils to all those who are the subjects of a saving work of the Spirit. He said unto him, Son of man, seest thou what they do, even the great abominations that the house of Israel committeth, that I should go far off from my sanctuary? But turn thee yet again, and thou shalt see greater abominations. Then he said to him, Son of man, hast thou seen what the ancients of the house of Israel do in the dark, every man in the chambers of his imagery? But turn thee yet again, and thou shalt see greater abominations that they do †. Thus the Lord deals with every chosen vessel. He takes him into the chambers of imagery that are in his own heart, and discovers to him the abominations done there in the dark, of which he had formerly no just apprehension. Besides, this knowledge is of an increasing nature. The more that the person sees of his heart, the less good will he discern in it, and the more evil. No believer gets a full view of his inward part at first. There is a progress in this, as in the other parts of sanctification. Indeed, he can never get a comprehensive view of it, because there is in it such an inconceivable

* Isa. vi. 5, 6.

† Isa. lxiv. 6.

* Ezek. xvi. 62, 63.

† Ezek. viii. 6, &c.

ceivable depth of iniquity. But according to his progress in grace, he advances in the knowledge of himself; and sees a great deal more of his own wickedness than he could ever have imagined was in him. The Lord leads him as he did the Prophet, from one heart-plague to another, from one chamber of imagery into another; still saying to him, I will show thee yet greater abominations. Thus we are made to know, if we follow on to know the Lord.

It must appear from what has been said, that we should be much more concerned about the diseases of the heart, than about those of the body. Were any of you affected in your bodies with a dreadful plague, that made your company burdensome to your dearest friends, and even loathsome to yourselves; that filled you with unspeakable pain, and exposed you to extreme danger; that made you unfit for all the actions and enjoyments of life; and presented you with the immediate and awful prospect of death: would you not tremble, and be filled with terror and apprehension; would you not implore every possible assistance, and eagerly embrace the most uncertain prospect of deliverance? Sinners, your case is unspeakably more deplorable. You may enjoy health of body and peace of mind. But your souls are infected with a plague inexpressibly more dreadful and malignant than any bodily calamity; a plague which is the cause of every malady to which your bodies are subject; that is gradually wasting your constitutions, and will soon make you return to the dust; a plague that makes you abominable to God, to angels, and to all the righteous; and that would render you loathsome to yourselves, were your eyes open to see it; a plague, that not only in its consequences affects your bodies, but impairs your souls; that diffuses contamination through all your faculties, and consigns them over to eternal suffering; nay a plague—that all human means are absolutely ineffectual to remove or alleviate! And this is the plague of sin. Perhaps, you think little of it, because you do not see its immediate effects, like those of an outward contagion. But can you shut your eyes, or harden your feelings against the innumerable diseases, pains, sicknesses, sufferings, calamities, and outward plagues, of which this is the fountain: against death itself, of which this is the cause? Can you shut your eyes against the multitude of evils, —murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, wars and devastations, which are all the natural fruits and certain evidences of this plague of the heart? From whence come wars and fightings among you? Come they not hence, even of your lusts, that war in your members *? Perhaps, you are undismayed at the thoughts of it, because you have a world of companions in suffering; because all your brethren of mankind are infected in the same manner. But would it lessen the pain, or the danger of an outward plague, that it affected all the inhabitants of the same city or country with yourselves? Would not its horrors be equal to you? And do you imagine, that it can anywise lessen the guilt, the pollution, the misery, or the danger of your situation, that the whole world lieth in wickedness? Or, can it diminish the terrors of hell, that there will be millions of sufferers besides you? Ah! No. Every soul will be so absorbed in its own sufferings, that the society of others can be no alleviation. Nay, may we not rather suppose it to augment their sufferings? The consciousness that the wicked will have of their zeal and activity in enticing others to sin, in encouraging and hardening them in it, will eternally prove an unspeakable enhancement of their common misery.

like

SINCE this plague is so dreadful, the symptoms of it so evident, and its consequences so fatal; will you deign to bestow a serious thought on it? Is it not a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God? Can you read of the poor woman, who laboured under a certain bodily plague for twelve years; and who, that she might be freed from it, had patiently suffered many things of many physicians, and had cheerfully fully spent all she had ; although she was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse * ;—without thinking it worth your trouble to suffer some anxiety, and spend some little of your time in considering the nature of your spiritual plague, and endeavouring to obtain deliverance ? Can you read of her eagerness, without one upbraiding thought for your own indifference ; although your danger and misery exceed hers, as much as the soul is better than the body ? Can you read of her patience and profuseness in spending her all, while she had only a mere probability ; and can you excuse your own wantonness and obduracy, while the word of God proclaims to you the certainty of a cure ? You must undoubtedly accuse her as a fool, who spent her all for her body ; if you will not condescend to avert your minds for a little from the world, to spend one serious thought, one moment's reflection for your precious souls ? But, sinners, do you really believe that you have souls ? The question may seem strange, but it is certainly necessary. For your invariable conduct, in preferring your bodies to your souls, would naturally suggest the idea, that you did not sincerely believe the existence of the latter. At any rate, if the soul be as much better than the body, as eternity exceeds time ; and if, notwithstanding, you pay much more attention to your bodies than to your souls ; unquestionably you practically deny their immaterial nature and eternal existence. Can you really believe that you have souls formed for immortality, and also that they are infected with a destructive and abominable plague ; and after all give yourselves no concern about them ? Neither God nor angels, men nor devils, will esteem you serious in your pretended persuasion of these truths, till you evidence it by a very different conduct. If you would be thought to believe these awful matters, apply yourselves diligently to discover your spiritual plagues ; and especially that sin which may by distinction be called the plague of your heart,

* Jam. iv. 1.

that

* Mark v. 25.—34.

that sin which doth so easily beset you, that iniquity which you roll as a sweet morsel under your tongue ; else it will prove your eternal ruin. This must be dealt with as Agag, whom Samuel bewed in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal.

SEEK a discovery of your plagues by the Holy Spirit. Especially be concerned to put the work of searching your hearts into the Lord's hand, saying, Examine me, and prove me, try my heart and my reins, O God ; and see if there be any wicked way in me at all, and lead me in thy way everlasting. He alone can truly discover them to you. Improve the promise by pleading it in the exercise of faith. Try to trust your souls on it as the ground of your hope ; while, at the same time, you are engaged in endeavouring duty. Like that woman formerly mentioned, strive to press through the crowd that you may get near to Christ. You must press into the kingdom of heaven ; press through the crowd of lusts that oppose you within, of the cares and allurements of this world, of wicked men and devils that oppose you without ; press through all this crowd, that you may get to Jesus. For the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force. Under the law, as soon as any one discovered the plague of leprosy, he was to appear before the priest. Show yourself, poor, guilty, defiled sinner to this great Highpriest ; and if you touch but the hem of his garment, you shall be healed. One touch, by faith, of the GARMENT of salvation, the robe of righteousness, that vesture dipped in blood, will dry up your plague, will remove both the guilt and pollution of your sin. Stedfastly credit his promise. I have seen his ways, and will heal him ;—I will heal their backsliding, and love them freely, for mine anger is turned away from him : and this kind Physician, this compassionate Highpriest will make you feel within yourself, that you are healed of your plague ; and as certainly say to you, as to that poor woman, Thy faith hath made thee whole, go in peace, and be whole of thy plague.

S E R M O N V.

ON THE NECESSITY OF KNOWING THE PLAGUE OF THE HEART.

I KINGS, viii. 38.

—Who shall know every man the plague of his own heart.—

SELF-KNOWLEDGE was considered, even by unenlightened heathens, as so indispensably necessary, that it was a motto engraved on one of their temples, Know thyself. Thus they made the stone cry out of the wall to every one who entered, that without this important acquisition, he was a vain worshipper. How many professed Christians are there, who may well blush at this relation, as they have never reckoned the knowledge of themselves a matter deserving their attention! Nay, are there not multitudes who industriously avoid the investigation of their own hearts? The greatest part of professors are as averse to look into themselves, as if the sight of their spiritual plagues would increase their malignity. They are as much afraid of being jealous of themselves, as if it were the greatest sin they could be chargeable with; as if a persuasion of the goodness of their own hearts were the only faith that the Gospel required. We see many as reluctant to fulfil the counsel of the Prophet to good Hezekiah, by setting their houses in order, and settling their worldly affairs, as if it would hasten the stroke of the king of terrors. But thousands are overcome by a far more destructive folly. They are as much afraid of inquiring into the state of their hearts, and endeavouring to have them set in order, according to the Word, as if a doubt of their salvation,

salvation, even while continuing in sin, would certainly expose them to eternal destruction. Is it a very bad sign of traders, when they are afraid to look into the state of their worldly circumstances? Surely then, if persons constantly avoid the exercise of self-examination, it is a decisive evidence that they are in a state of bankruptcy for eternity. A man's wounds must be noisome indeed, if he cannot bear the sight of them, if he be afraid of his own company; and he must be deeply confirmed in the most deplorable state, who will rather turn his eyes any way, than to the plague of his own heart. But all such pretended Christians have the same inscription on their hearts that Paul observed on the Athenian altar; To the unknown God: and they will ever continue to worship him ignorantly, till they become better acquainted with themselves.

THE II. head of the method is to illustrate the necessity of such a knowledge of the plague of the heart, as we have endeavoured to describe.

I. THIS knowledge of the heart is necessary, because without it there can be no due knowledge of God*. The perfections of the Divine nature being infinite,

VOL. I.

M

* WHEN we speak of the saving knowledge of the heart as of such importance, that without it there can be no saving knowledge of God, &c. &c. it is by no means intended, that the former can precede the latter. For whatever apprehensions a man may entertain of the evil of his own heart; they are only of a legal nature, they belong to the old Covenant, and are connected with its curse, unless they proceed from a saving discovery of God in a regenerating work of the Holy Spirit. In regeneration, according to the order of nature, a true discovery of sin, as the plague of the heart, is antecedent to the exercise of faith in Christ as the Healer; because the illumination of the understanding precedes the gracious inclination of the will. But as this work is instantaneous, and as the parts of it know no difference in order of time, faith may justly be viewed as going before this knowledge, in as far as it is evident to us, and properly exercised by us; because this is the first grace of the Spirit that is exercised in the renewed heart; as it is only in consequence of a saving apprehension of God in Christ that sin appears in its natural wickedness
and

infinite, are therefore entirely above our comprehension as creatures. But they are doubly incomprehensible to us as sinners. There is naturally a twofold veil between us and them. There is the veil of creature-weakness, which renders it impossible for us to form adequate apprehensions of the nature of God. But there is also the veil of moral depravity, and actual pollution, which so darkens the mind, that it cannot form even those apprehensions of his glorious attributes, which were competent to it in the state of innocence. Sin throws a mist over all the Divine perfections, that conceals their beauty, and robs them of their lustre; not in reality, but only in the mind of the sinner himself. Now, it is only in consequence of the total removal of sin, that we can entertain just apprehensions of God. But as none, while in this world, are entirely delivered from sin, there is another way in which the defect, arising from our imperfection, is, in some measure, supplied, and by which man attains such discoveries and deformity, and so as immediately to produce the exercise of evangelical mourning. Then only can we remember our own evil ways, when he has accomplished his promise of giving the new heart and right spirit, (Ezek. xxxvi. 26.—31.) Therefore, when we assert the necessity of this knowledge, in relation to a saving acquaintance with God and eternal interests, we only speak of these things, as pointing out the indispensable connection of the one with the other, and to illustrate the folly and blindness of those who flatter themselves that they are savingly acquainted with God, while ignorant of themselves.

NOR is it meant, that the knowledge of the heart is in any sense our title to believe, or the foundation of our boldness in any duty we perform. The gracious offers and promises of the Gospel, the endearing relation which Christ bears to mankind—sinners as a Kinsman redeemer, and the intrinsic merit of his blood, are alone the warrant of faith; and his righteousness is the only foundation of our approach to God in every duty, whether in the first act of faith, or in any subsequent act in the Christian life.

NOR, still farther, do we mean to put the knowledge of the heart in the place of faith as embracing the righteousness of Jesus Christ. But we consider this knowledge as inseparably connected with all genuine faith in the performance of every religious duty. As without faith it is impossible to please God, that faith is nowise pleasing to him, that carries not along with it this saving knowledge.

discoveries of God as are connected with salvation, and are the happy prelude of a perfect knowledge of him in glory, according to his limited capacity. This end is effected, when he is blessed with a real and affecting discovery of the plague of his heart. While this remains in full power, the sinner views every thing, even the nature and perfections of God himself, through a false medium,—the supreme love that he hath to sin. But when the power of sin is broken, instead of viewing objects through this medium, he uses it rather as a contrast. Instead of judging of them according to their conformity to sin, and subserviency to the indulgence of it, he estimates their dignity and worth by their contrariety and disconformity to this plague of the heart. Sin is the heart-idol, the god of every natural man, by which he frames his ideas of right and wrong, of agreeable and hateful: and till this idol be cast down, he will assuredly form a false judgment of every thing moral in its nature. Yea, so blind is he, that he virtually esteems God to be altogether such an one as himself, and fondly imagines that he will approve his sin. But when his eyes are opened to the evils of his heart, he judges in a manner entirely different.

THIS knowledge is especially necessary in order to a right apprehension of the perfections of holiness, justice and mercy in God. While we continue ignorant of ourselves, we think very unjustly of Divine holiness. Although this is that perfection, according to which God essentially hates sin, as directly contrary to his nature; yet the ignorant sinner cannot suffer himself to think that sin can be really hateful to God, because he loves it so much himself. Or, if he allow that God hates it, he cannot believe that he hates it so much as the Scripture represents. But when the Holy Spirit discovers to him his own heart, he sees sin to be so extremely hateful in itself, and so unlike to God, that he is fully persuaded it must be the object of his infinite abhorrence. Without the knowledge of the heart, one can have no suitable idea

idea of the justice of God. According to this perfection, he essentially punishes sin, as contrary to his nature, and as a rebellion against his authority. But the sinner, as long as he sees only the fair side of sin, as agreeable to his senses, without perceiving its filthiness, cannot imagine that God will punish men for that which is so natural to them, and which appears to him so innocent. He would esteem this to be cruelty rather than justice. The many threatenings contained in the Word against sin, he views rather as beacons set up to deter men from it, than as declarations of what God is really determined to do. Nay, rather than believe all these threatenings, he would indulge himself in an idea much more grateful to his corrupt heart, that perhaps the Scripture is only a fable cunningly devised, for the peace and order of civil society. But when he sees his own heart, and learns the malignant nature of sin, his conscience affixes its seal to every curse written in the book of God. He perceives that he, who in Scripture claims the character of God, would be unworthy of it, were it not essential to his nature, not only to hate, but to punish sin. For were it essential to him to hate sin, and not to punish it; he would of necessity be an inactive being, who willed what he was not able to perform; and was therefore unfit for being the Moral Governor of the world; whose will must be a law to his creatures, and whose acts must confirm his law, and proclaim his authority. While ignorant of his heart, a man can have no just ideas of Divine mercy. He reckons it possible for God to pardon sin without a satisfaction; and imagines, that if he depend on the mere general mercy of his nature, he is safe for eternity. But when he obtains a view of the mystery of iniquity and abomination in his heart, he is fully convinced, that God cannot, consistently with himself, pardon sin, which is so atrocious an offence against his nature, without a full atonement. While a stranger to himself, he was totally ignorant of the connection connection and consistency of the Divine attributes, or of that relation which they bear, one to another. But now he sees that there would be a variance amongst them, that is a variance in God himself, could one be glorified to the injury of another. While ignorant of his heart, he had a low estimation of the Divine mercy in the method of salvation through Jesus Christ; he saw no surprising love, nor unparalleled grace in this display; he viewed it all with an unaffected indifference. But when he has once seen his vile self, his filthy and impure heart, he is astonished at the sovereign love of God, in ever entertaining thoughts of compassion to such despicable worms, and especially in giving such an incomprehensible evidence of it, as to send his own Son to die for them. Then, in astonishment at his former darkness, he cries out; O the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God: how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! I will sing of the mercies of the Lord for ever.

2. THIS knowledge is necessary in order to a due improvement of the remedy provided in the gospel for the plague of the heart. This is the Lord Jesus Christ. Indeed he is both the remedy and the Physician who applies it. This is a remedy of sovereign efficacy. There never was a single instance of its failure. Is there not balm in Gilead, is there not a physician there? The balm that this Physician applies, is his own blood. For the blood of Christ cleanseth us from all sin. The only plague of the soul is sin; and what form soever it assume, the blood of Christ will infallibly remove it. But we cannot improve this gospel remedy aright, without a knowledge of the disease. It would be vain for a distressed person to apply to an earthly physician for the removal of an inward disease, were he entirely unacquainted with its seat. However great the attention of the physician, however consummate his skill, they would be both useless to his patient, if he could give him no information of the nature and symptoms of his complaint. In like manner, we can make

make no suitable improvement of the heavenly Physician, or of the remedy provided for us, while we remain entire strangers to our spiritual plagues. Indeed, the resemblance fails here: for although an earthly physician, however accomplished, often can only guess at the nature of an inward disease, but cannot declare it with absolute certainty; our Physician, whose name is Jehovah the Healer, can not only remove the disease when made known, but can discover it without the smallest difficulty. For he knows the heart; and whenever he enables a sinner to improve himself as the remedy, he, at the same time, favours him with a clear discovery of the plague. Often indeed, a man's plague is in some measure made known to him, while he is left under its power. But always where the cure is wrought, there is a discovery of the plague. And it is necessary that it should be so; for otherwise the patient would have no just apprehensions of his obligations to the Healer. A conviction of the dreadful nature of his malady, when attended with deliverance from it, will be a prevailing motive to the exercise of gratitude to his sovereign benefactor.

WITHOUT a due knowledge of the plague of the heart, we will never make a personal application to the Physician, nor a particular appropriation of the remedy to ourselves. Why is it that the greatest part of the hearers of the gospel rest satisfied with a general notional faith in Christ, as a common Saviour; but are nowise concerned to embrace him as their own? The reason is; they have no real discernment of the fatal plagues of the inward part, and are thus entirely ignorant of their need of him. They please themselves with a general knowledge of their sins, and therefore rest satisfied without a particular interest in the Saviour. They say; We are rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing; and know not that they are wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked. Therefore they despise his counsel, and will not buy of him gold tried in the fire, that they

they may be rich, nor white raiment that they may be clothed, and that the shame of their nakedness do not appear; nor anoint their eyes with eye-salve, that they may see*. For they that be whole, in their own apprehension, need not the physician, i. e. they do not see their need of him, but they that are sick †.—This knowledge is absolutely necessary to give us a just idea of the importance of salvation. Why is it that multitudes account it such an easy matter to be saved; apprehend, that they can at any time believe in Christ, and repent of their sins; that in their dying moments they can implore mercy; and that their salvation will be so easily accomplished, as to be the certain fruit of a languishing prayer, of a feeble wish, or even of one serious thought, when life is fluttering on the lip, and when the soul is already on the very confines of eternity? These false and ruinous imaginations are the native consequence of their ignorance of themselves, of the evil nature of sin, and of the plague of the heart. This is the great reason why thousands of thousands, who enjoy a gospel-dispensation, esteem it such a trifling privilege, and from Sabbath to Sabbath, from year to year, wilfully continue to despise the gracious offers of healing and deliverance; to trample under foot the Son of God, to count the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing, to do despite unto the Spirit of grace; and so inevitably and obstinately perish.

THIS knowledge is not only necessary to the sinner, but constantly so to the believer, that he may thence learn to make a daily improvement of the remedy. Although the dominion of sin is subdued, yet he sins every day. The plagues of his heart are always appearing, one after another; and they can only be prevented from prevailing against him, by a constant unremitted application to Jesus the Physician. Although the power of every plague is broken, yet the remains of every one are to be found in his heart; for he will never be entirely delivered from them in this world.

* Rev. iii. 17, 18.

† Matth. ix. 12.

world. It is the salutary air of that heavenly land, where the inhabitant says not, I am sick; the leaves of that tree, which are for the healing of the nations, and the water of that river of life that proceedeth from under the throne of God, and of the Lamb; that can alone remove all the symptoms and consequences of this fatal plague.

3. THIS knowledge is necessary to all genuine repentance. Whatever sorrow we have for sin, unless it proceeds from a right knowledge of our own hearts, is only the sorrow of the world, and is unconnected with salvation. Besides, it is generally a sorrow for the sins of the life, rather than for those of the heart. But whenever a person obtains a discovery of the plague of his own heart, he is made to sorrow after a goaty sort.—He can have no just view of the cause of sorrow, till he get a just view of the sin of his heart; because sin hath its seat, its empire there. We cannot see it aright, but as it appears there in its natural light, without any disguise. Without this, all the sorrow that a man hath for sin, is only washing the outside of the cup, or of the platter, while the inside is full of nastiness. After all the tears and sighs spent in this kind of repentance, he is no better than a whited sepulchre, fair without, but within full of rottenness and corruption.—Our sorrow for sin will otherwise be very shortlived. If it proceed not from a knowledge of the heart, it will be as transitory as the joy of those hearers, represented under the metaphor of the stony ground. Like grain without a proper root, it will soon fade away. For all genuine repentance has its root in the heart. It penetrates as far as sin itself. Legal repentance goes no farther than the conscience; Gospel repentance reaches to the heart, strictly viewed, as influencing the will and affections; because legal repentance takes place without the knowledge of the heart, but evangelical repentance always carries this along with it.—The knowledge of the plague of the heart opens a new scene for the exercise of repentance. One, who hath never before mourned over any evils but but those of the life, upon a view of the heart, sees innumerable evils and iniquities there, greater than he hath ever been left to commit in his outward conversation. Such a saving discovery is so affecting, as to give a keener edge to repentance, than it ever had before. Knowledge that is so humiliating, will make our sorrow more lively.—The necessity of this knowledge to the exercise of all true repentance is evident from this, that it is the repentance of the heart which is required. Therefore also now saith the Lord, turn ye even to me, with ALL YOUR HEART,—and rend your HEARTS, and not your garments *. But how is it possible to rend the heart, or to turn to the Lord with the heart, if the heart itself be unknown?

4. This knowledge is necessary to all acceptable worship. One branch of Divine worship is particularly specified in the passage before us; this is prayer. What prayer or supplication shall be made by any man who shall know the plague of his own heart. Without this knowledge, there can be no right praying. Until a person be acquainted with the plague of his heart, he is at a loss what to pray for; his mouth is often shut before God; he has no proper sense of his own spiritual necessities. But as soon as the state of his soul is unfolded by the Spirit, he sees an extensive field opened to him, and always finds enough within himself as matter of prayer, although there were nothing else that required his attention. Here he sees the most ample ground for confession, petition and thanksgiving. He has much to confess; for the plagues of his heart are just so many enemies against God within him, which he would wish ever to mourn over. His heart affords abundant reason for petition; for he finds it necessary daily to implore the destruction of all these lusts that are enemies to God, and seeking his destruction, and to entreat rich supplies of grace for enabling him faithfully to maintain the struggle against them. He has also sufficient ground of thanksgiving; because the Lord hath not left him to commit all those sins that his own wicked heart would have led him to, or suffered him to proceed to the same excess of riot with others, whose hearts were naturally just as good as his. When he sees the senses of the drunkard, as well as his substance, worn out by intemperance; when he contemplates the misery of the unclean person, whose conscience and life are equally wretched by a sense of his guilt, and the consequences of it; or when he turns his eye to those, who, for theft, or robbery, or murder, are brought to an untimely end; and at the same time, finds such a desperate wickedness in his own heart; what reason has he to bless the Lord, that he hath not suffered him to proceed to the same degree of open iniquity! The Christian's own evil heart discovers such a depth of sin, such a multitude of iniquities, that with the word as his rule, and the Holy Spirit as his interpreter, he needs no other prayer-book. There he sees more matter, than would employ him all the days of his life. If I should count them, saith he, they are more than the hairs upon my head: nay he perceives continued reason for thanksgiving that he is out of hell. It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed. Indeed, without this knowledge of the heart, all the prayers that one presents to God, are, in his esteem, vain oblations, they never enter into the ears of the God of Sabaoth. Paul, before his conversion, was a strict Pharisee, touching the righteousness of the law blameless; and undoubtedly, in this state, he had offered up many prayers to God. But he was then ignorant of his own heart. He was then alive, in his own apprehension, without the law, without a knowledge of its spirituality and extent, and of his own disconformity to it; and during all this time, he never once prayed in God's account, because he never knew his inward wickedness, and was proceeding on a false foundation. But no sooner does he get a view of this by the Spirit, no sooner does the commandment come, and sin appear sin, and become exceeding sinful, than God takes as particular notice of his prayer, as if he had never tried the exercise before. *Behold he prayeth.

* Joel ii. 12, 13.

he

We shall only mention another ordinance as confirming the observation; this is the Lord's supper. It is expressly enjoined, Let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup †.—Now, it is not simply the performance of the duty of self-examination that is required. The command implies the necessity of a saving knowledge of the heart, of the evil of sin, of Christ as the only remedy, and the necessity of a personal interest in this remedy. Therefore is that awful caution added; For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, not discerning the Lord's body; and every one eateth and drinketh unworthily, who partakes of this ordinance ignorantly, without a saving discernment of the plague of his own heart; for without this, there can be no discernment of that healing efficacy which is in the Lord's body. No kind of religious worship can be acceptable to God without the knowledge of the heart. For it is indispensably required, in all the worship we give him, that we worship him in spirit and in truth. Now we cannot worship God in spirit, when we do not know our own spirits. That service can never be spiritual, which proceeds from a heart ignorant of itself. Nor can we thus worship him in truth. Our confessions and supplications are only the language of the lip, or at most the effusions of a frightened conscience, till we know ourselves. Till then we are never really serious in any act of adoration.

5. It is necessary for the keeping of the heart. To this duty we are earnestly exhorted in the word of God; and it is certainly a duty of the greatest importance. Keep thy heart with all diligence ‡. The words may be read, Keep thy heart ABOVE all KEEPING, as signifying, that the utmost vigilance is required. And a very forcible reason is subjoined; for out of it are the issues of life. All our actions, which are the issues

* Acts ix. 11.

† 1 Cor. xi. 28, 29.

‡ Prov iv. 23.

sues of life, whether natural, civil, or religious, spring from the heart. This is the fountain of them all, whether they are good or evil, whether they lead to life or death: because the heart, strictly understood, as denoting the will and affections, is the operative power of the soul. Of the same import is the declaration of our Lord; These things which proceed out of the mouth, come forth from the heart, and THEY defile the man. We have already seen that sin, the spiritual plague of man, properly has its seat in the heart, and that thence it infects and defiles the conversation. It will therefore follow, that it is of the last consequence that the heart be kept with peculiar care. We do not mean from this to insinuate, that man is capable of himself to keep his heart. The contrary is declared in the Holy Scriptures. The way of man is not in himself. Cursed be man that trusteth in man, that is, that trusteth in himself; Jer. xvii. 5. and the reason is given in ver. 9. For the heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked. Being so deceitful, he cannot keep it. But the keeping of the heart is a duty incumbent on us, which, although we cannot perform in our own strength, we must endeavour in the strength of the Lord. For while he requires of us, that we trust in him, do good, and delight ourselves in the Lord, he, at the same time, enjoins us to commit our way to him, and promises that he will bring it to pass *. As the keeping of the heart is of such importance, it is a duty, to the performance of which, the knowledge of the evils of the heart is indispensably requisite.—We cannot attain to the keeping of the heart, unless we attain to humility. Now, the knowledge of the evils of the heart is necessary to the exercise of humility. Therefore these two are joined together in scripture. We learn their connection from the exercise of the Prophet Jeremiah, who speaks in this manner: Remembering mine affliction and my misery, the wormwood and the gall: my soul had them still in remembrance, and is humbled in me †.—Tranquillity of soul in the service of God

* Psal. xxxvii. 3, 4, 5.

† Lam. iii. 19, 20.

God is one important branch of the keeping of the heart; and this cannot be attained without the trial and knowledge of the heart. Let us here attend to the exhortation of the Psalmist: Commune with your own heart, and be still *. The stillness that is here meant, is a blessed settlement of heart upon God; a rest and reliance of soul on him, as our strength and support, according to the use of the same word; Psal. xxxvii. 7. Rest in the Lord.—

BUT to speak more comprehensively of the keeping of the heart, it consists in the constant mortification of sin; and in the lively exercise of all grace. Now, the knowledge of the heart is undoubtedly necessary in the highest degree, for the mortification of sin. For how can its plagues be subdued, unless they be discovered. Vain are all a person's pretences to mortification, if he remain unacquainted with his heart. One might as well pretend to subdue an enemy, before he saw him, either in the field, or in the camp; nay, even before he knew who his enemy was! Our Lord evidently supposes the knowledge of secret corruptions, as lying at the very root of mortification; and not merely a general knowledge of them, but a particular acquaintance with that lust, or plague of the heart, which especially requires it. Therefore, he says, If thy hand or thy foot offend thee, cut them off, and cast them from thee: if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee †. This implies, that as lusts may be as dear to us as the most useful members of our body, we ought to be as particularly acquainted with them, that we may, through the Spirit, subdue them, as with our eyes, our hands, and our feet; and that those who have not this distinct and particular knowledge of their heart-plagues, are as ignorant in a spiritual, as those in a natural sense, who cannot discern between their right hand and their left. Would it appear the extreme of folly in a person infected with a malignant disease, plague, or mortification in his body, from which the metaphors, both in the words of our text, and in those now mentioned, are evidently taken,—to persuade himself that he was entirely free of all danger, before he were rightly acquainted with the nature of his disease; or, in order to remove it, to lop off a limb at a venture, without knowing which of his members was particularly affected? And is it not also the extreme of folly, in a spiritual sense, for a person to pretend he has made progress in mortification, who remains hitherto a stranger to the plague of his heart? Therefore, the Psalmist proposes this question: Wherewith shall a young man cleanse his way? And gives such an answer as denotes, that the way to subdue sin is first to search it out; *by taking heed thereto, according to thy word. And, in another place, he makes this declaration: If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not bear me.

the

* Psal. iv. 4.

† Mat. xviii. 8, 9.

NOR can the believer make progress in holiness, or attain to the vigorous exercise of grace in any other way. Is it incumbent upon a sovereign to be well acquainted with the most defenceless places of his kingdom, where there is the greatest danger of invasion? Ought a general particularly to know the weakest places of the wall, where his enemy is most likely to make an attack, or effect a breach, that the most powerful supplies may be directed to these quarters? And ought not the Christian to be especially acquainted with his own heart, that he may know where his lusts are strongest; where the plague of sin rages with greatest violence; and that he may apply to the Lord for renewed supplies of grace, suited to his present necessities. As sin and grace are two contraries in his soul, those graces, in a peculiar manner, require confirmation, that in their nature are directly opposed to the most prevalent corruptions. When his unbelief is very powerful, this prayer should be constantly in his mouth: Lord increase my faith. When enmity is raging, he requires a renewed communication of love. He needs patience strengthened, when he is ready to be overcome by fretfulness.

* Psal. cxix. 9.

fretfulness. For, as the Lord at first subdues sin in the heart, by implanting a principle of grace; it is in the same way that he carries on the good work, and subdues sin more and more. He gives the believer renewed communications of those graces that are directly opposed in their nature to his most powerful corruptions; grace to help him in time of need. Now, the knowledge of the heart is necessary for this purpose: Therefore we are called to ask, seek, and knock, with the promise of receiving, finding, and having admittance. But how shall we not only ask, but be importunate, if unacquainted with our necessities?

6. NECESSARY for the due regulation of the life. Even as renewed by grace, we can no more accomplish this of ourselves than we can keep our hearts. For it is God that worketh in us, both to will and to do. He constantly makes use of means to bring us to holiness of life; and one mean for this purpose is, the discovery of the evils of the heart. All the pretences that men make to holiness of conversation, before they know their own hearts, are vain and hypocritical, false and fruitless. They may have some reformation of life for a time, from the convictions of their natural consciences; but it deserves not the name, as it partakes not of the nature of holiness. Outward and open sins are relinquished, only that those which are secret may be more greedily committed. The character of Ephraim, although strictly viewed, it has another meaning, will, in the way of accommodation, apply to all unrenewed men. Ephraim is a silly dove without heart *. Those who are ignorant of their heart, destitute of spiritual understanding, are, in God's reckoning, as if they were without heart altogether. Their actions are not esteemed holy by him, because they are performed without the heart; they want the very soul of holy actions: So it is said by Solomon, Fools die for want of wisdom, literally, for want of heart; Prov. x. 21. They also follow the conduct of Ephraim, of whom it is said, They go to Egypt, and seek unto Assyria.
They

* Hos. vii. 11.

They betake themselves to false grounds of trust, instead of confiding in divine strength. They put their trust in those actions that they falsely term holy: and although they may continue in a course of outward reformation for a time, yet often they afterwards become worse than ever. It happens unto them, according to the true proverb, The dog is turned to his own vomit again, and the sow that was washed, to her wallowing in the mire. Our Lord compares their situation to an house that has been empty, swept, and garnished. But their last end proves worse than the first.*

WE have already mentioned the observation of the wise man, concerning the heart, that from it are the issues of life. Now, if the issues of life are from the heart, it is exceedingly necessary that itself should be well known; that thus, by the work of the holy Spirit in us, we may be made to cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, and to perfect holiness in the fear of the Lord. Whenever the light of the Spirit shines into the heart that was formerly in darkness, it breaks out in the life by a godly conversation; and the light of the believer so shines before men, that others seeing his good works glorify his Father in heaven. Therefore, it is said, that the wise in heart shall receive commandments, whereas the prating fool shall fall †. Those only who have received spiritual wisdom to discern their own hearts, can either receive or obey God's commandments: and whatever professions of subjection or obedience are made by sinners, they will certainly fail in fulfilling them. It is only that wisdom which is from above, that is full of good fruits. Let us listen to the testimony of the Psalmist, with regard to the importance of knowing the heart, to the exercise of true obedience in the life: I thought on my ways. This implies a search into and knowledge of his heart, as well as of his life. Observe the consequence: And I turned my feet unto thy testimonies. I made haste, and delayed not to keep thy commandments †.

FROM

* Mat. xii. 43.

† Prov. x. 8.

‡ Psal. cxix. 59, 60.

FROM what has now been offered on this subject, we would call and entreat you all to come to the all-powerful Physician, and to put your various plagues in his hand. He healeth every manner of sickness and disease among the people. There is a fountain opened for the house of David, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for sin and for uncleanness. His precious blood is the fountain: and this fountain was opened for sinners from all eternity, in the purpose of God. It was opened in the promises, in typical sacrifices, and other ordinances, ever since the entrance of sin: For Christ is the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world. Ever since it was first opened, it has been flowing for the healing of diseased souls. This fountain was actually opened in the death of Christ, when his side was pierced on mount Calvary, whence came blood and water. It is still as efficacious as ever; for it is an inexhaustible fountain,—a fountain that ever flows,—and there is the freest access to it. For it is opened to the house of David, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem; to rich and poor, old and young, bond and free, great and mean; to persons of every character, without any distinction. All who hear the call of the gospel, have a right to come and wash therein. And this fountain is for removing all sin and uncleanness; the power of sin, the guilt of sin, its pollution, its prevalence, and its very inbeing at length. Come then to this omnipotent Physician; for it is ground of comfort to you, that not only is this fountain opened, but Christ acts the part of a physician, by washing sinners in it, as they cannot wash themselves. He is the angel who both troubles the waters, and puts the diseased into them, that they may receive a cure. Whatever is your plague, he can easily remove it. He needs only to speak the word, and you shall be healed. You who have never had your maladies in any degree removed, should be concerned now to make a diligent improvement of his call. Have others formerly experienced the virtue of his blood? Then make a renewed application to it. While you are called to come by faith to this fountain, as you cannot come of yourselves, although it is your duty constantly to endeavour it; remember, for your encouragement, that he is engaged to take the work of cleansing you into his own hand; and that this is his promise: Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean: from all your filthiness, and from all your idols will I cleanse you.

S E R M O N

S E R M O N VI.

ON THE NECESSITY OF KNOWING THE PLAGUE OF THE HEART.

I KINGS, viii. 38.

—Who shall know every man the plague of his own heart.—

THE enemies of Samson were exceedingly anxious to know wherein his great STRENGTH lay, that they might accomplish his ruin. It is of no less importance for the Christian to know wherein his great weakness lies, that he may, through the power of God, accomplish the ruin of his spiritual enemies. He is at no loss as to the seat and repository of his strength. He finds that it is only laid up in Christ his vital Head. But he cannot make a right improvement of the life, grace and strength treasured up in Him, till truly acquainted with his own weakness: and this he can only learn, when the Spirit discovers to him the plague of his heart.

ON the II. head we have already endeavoured to illustrate the necessity of a saving knowledge of the heart from its connection with the due knowledge of God, improvement of the remedy, genuine repentance, acceptable worship, keeping of the heart, and regulation of the life.

7. THE necessity of this knowledge farther appears from its inseparable connection with the purification and peace of conscience. The heart and conscience are terms often used promiscuously in Scripture, as denoting the same thing. But if we understand the heart in its strict and proper sense, as signifying the will and affections, the conscience is to be viewed as a different faculty of the soul. It is that power implanted in man, by which he forms a judgment of the actions of his life, and of the very thoughts of his heart, as being either right or wrong, conformable or contrary to the law of God. Thus the conscience beareth witness, and the thoughts the mean while either accuse, or else excuse one another *. It is a deputy for God in the breast of man, which ought constantly to remind him of his subjection and accountableness to the Supreme Judge. But there are two evils that especially affect the conscience of every natural man, in a greater or less degree. It is defiled and it is disturbed. Sin deprives it both of purity and of peace. His conscience is defiled. Unto the pure all things are pure, but unto them that are defiled and unbelieving is nothing pure, but even their mind and conscience is defiled †. Sin is the cause of this pollution. For there can be no moral uncleanness but what springs from this fountain. The defilement of conscience appears by its incapacity to judge of the actions of the person; by its blindness in mistaking right for wrong, and wrong for right; by wilful self-perversion; by giving a judgment against its own conviction; by affording an unfair representation to the person, holding up sin in the place of duty, and calling evil good. This defilement sometimes so remarkably increases by the indulgence of sin, that conscience becomes feared as with a hot iron ‡. When this is the case, it seldom or never reproves; it is in a manner past feeling; it is nowise moved by the most atrocious offences of its subject against the Divine law. In general, a defiled conscience reproves for the grosser sins of the life only; but passes over in silence the multiplied abominations of the heart. Sin bribes it with the prospect of pleasure and peace, to give it as little trouble as possible about outward transgressions, and none at all about its inward workings: and like like an unjust judge, who wishes to share in the profits of the crime, conscience takes no more notice of it than is barely necessary to maintain a name, and save appearances with the world. In this state is the conscience of the natural man, and thus it will continue till he obtain a saving discovery of the plague of his heart. Then that supernatural light, diffused by the Holy Spirit through the heart, reflects on conscience, and discovers its blindness, unfaithfulness, treachery, and all the abominations lurking in it. Then conscience, instead of being a fire that should have consumed sin, appears to have been only as a feeble spark hid among ashes, and almost entirely extinguished. Then it discovers the ghosts, as it were, of ten thousand former iniquities, the cry of whose guilt and pollution has been stifled by its own hand, while acting as an unfaithful watchman. Those actions that the sinner was taught by his conscience to consider, either as very little sins, or as entirely harmless, he sees rising up as from the dead, in all their number, magnitude, and aggravated circumstances. His iniquities which were quite forgotten, or very slightly remembered, like the dry bones in the valley of vision, in consequence of the discovery of his heart, by the breathing of the Holy Ghost on it, first make a noise, then a shaking, and at length stand up an exceeding great army. Then conscience also accuses the heart, and produces a register of heart-sins and secret iniquities, of which the person had no apprehension.
heart

* Rom. ii. 15.

† Tit. i. 15.

‡ 1 Tim. iv. 2.

But the conscience is not merely discovered by means of this knowledge. It is also purified. Therefore it is said,—How much more shall the blood of Christ, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God * ? The blood of Christ applied to this power of the soul, purges it from DEAD works, from those works that have been performed in a state of spiritual death ; that are dead as being unacceptable to God, because they proceed not from a renewed nature

and

* Heb. ix. 14.

and sanctified heart ; and dead, as being deadly in their nature, and subjecting him more and more to eternal death. Conscience is thus purged from the pollution of these works, and from their guilt as binding over the sinner to punishment. In consequence of this, he is enabled to serve the living God, in the exercise of faith on him, as reconciled through the blood of Christ. Because of the necessary connection of the knowledge of the heart with the purification of conscience, the Spirit joins a true heart and a *pure conscience together. Let us draw near with a TRUE heart ;—having our heart sprinkled from an EVIL conscience. Now, our heart can never be true, till, by the light of the Spirit, we perceive its natural situation. Till then it is a false heart, and attended by an evil conscience. But as soon as this gracious discovery is made, and integrity of heart bestowed, the conscience is delivered from its habitual pollution. Farther, in the natural man, this power is not only defiled, but also disturbed. It hath no proper peace. Not only is it overwhelmed with guilt and pollution, but often distressed with a sense of guilt, and fear of deserved wrath. Indeed the conscience, in an unrenewed state, is most generally too much at peace. But the peace which it enjoys is false. It springs not from reconciliation to God, and pardon, but only from the concealment and indulgence of iniquity. It is not the fruit of a deliverance from sin, but a peace in the commission of it, arising from the smothering of its own convictions, and from the resistance of the ordinary motions of the Spirit. Now, without the knowledge of our own hearts, we can have no true peace of conscience ; for otherwise our sins are either hid from us, or falsely glossed over, so that their pollution and punishment are kept out of sight. Therefore a pure heart and a good conscience are mentioned in connection : The end of the commandment is charity out of a PURE heart and a GOOD conscience †. That conscience is called good, in which the

* Heb. x. 22.

† 1 Tim. i. 5.

the peace of God dwells ; and this is inseparable from a pure heart, a heart that hath both seen and been delivered from its abominations. No sooner are men savingly instructed by the Spirit, with regard to their own hearts, than they have a real and blessed peace of conscience. *All thy children shall be taught of the Lord, and great shall be the peace of thy children. In righteousness shalt thou be established ; thou shalt be far from oppression, for thou shalt not FEAR, and from TROUBLE, for it shall not come near thee. Behold I will bring it health and cure, and I will cure them, and reveal unto them the abundance of PEACE and TRUTH †. It is the work of Christ, and the way in which he carries on his work, to give LIGHT to them that sit in darkness, and in the shadow of death, and to guide their feet into the way of peace.

8. THIS knowledge is necessary to enable us to form a right and impartial judgment of our state before God. Know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates?—that is, still at a distance from God. He, who is not savingly acquainted with his heart, may know by the most unquestionable evidences, that he is a wicked man, or an hypocrite ; but he can have no just apprehensions of the wretchedness of his situation. For a man to judge of his state merely by his actions, without looking into his heart, would argue as great stupidity, as if one should pretend to judge of the real and internal situation of a prison or madhouse, by looking at the structure of the edifice. Undoubtedly, the life is an evidence of the state of the heart, as the fruit is of the nature of the tree ; and it is only by the external conduct that others can form their judgment, because they can go no farther. But although this is the only method of judging left to others, a man himself must not stop here. Others might conclude, that their friend was perfectly well, from the healthiness of his look, and apparent vigour of his constitution ; but it would be great folly for him to form the same conclusion

* Isa. liv. 13, 14.

† Jer. xxxiii. 6.

clusion from these outward appearances, if, from many inward symptoms, he had reason to apprehend, that there was some fatal disease preying on his vitals. It is the duty of every man to look into his own heart, to try it by the unerring rule of the word, and to implore the direction of the Holy Spirit; that he may be enabled to judge with integrity of his real state, as he appears before the holy and just God. A man can never attain this knowledge, but by the Spirit as his guide; for it is his work to convince the world of sin. But even by the exertion of his natural abilities, every natural man might know a great deal more of his heart than he does. However men, in general, either give themselves no trouble about this important inquiry, or wilfully blind their minds, and refuse to believe what they see. It is therefore only by the knowledge of the heart that we can apprehend our state. If from the situation of our heart we have good reason to conclude that our state is bad, we may be assured that it appears so before God. Therefore, saith the Apostle John, *If our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things. Beloved, if our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence towards God. When a person is in darkness about the state of his soul, or has reason to think that he is in a state of alienation from God; this affects his mind with much distrust and confusion in all spiritual exercises. But if, on the contrary, from an impartial examination of our hearts, we have reason to conclude that they are right with him and sound in his statutes, and that we are indulging no known sin; holy freedom and boldness in coming to him, as our reconciled God and Father, is the native consequence.

9. THE knowledge of our hearts tends to inspire us with charity towards our brethren of mankind. Some men are naturally less severe and censorious in their disposition than others. But genuine charity is not natural to man, and can proceed from the work

* 1 John iii. 20. 21.

work of the Spirit only. He makes use of means in working a conformity to himself; and a discovery of the heart is one mean eminently subservient to this end. It is a very bad evidence of any one, if he has it as his principal employment to find out and propagate the faults and blemishes of others. This is directly contrary to the rule of Christian charity, which teacheth us to bear one another's burdens, conceal the infirmities of each other, and so to fulfil the law of Christ. On this head, how cutting is that question proposed by Him, who was the greatest pattern of love that the world ever saw, *Why beholdest thou the MOTE that is in thy BROTHER'S eye: but considerest not the BEAM that is in thine OWN eye? How severe his reproof?—Thou hypocrite, first cast out the BEAM that is in thine OWN eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the MOTE out of thy BROTHER'S eye.—This temper also demonstrates, that he who is under its influence, is a great stranger to the exercise of self-denial. For, when showing an eagerness to propal the faults of others, he intends the discovery as a foil to his own excellencies; and tacitly extols himself for the supposed want of such blemishes. This is a very common, although to persons of any discernment, a very evident way of soliciting self-praise; instead of which it ought always to meet with contempt and detestation. As many follow this course to gain the approbation of man; the self-righteous Pharisee, described by Christ, endeavoured, in this way, to commend himself to God; praying thus with himself, God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men are, —nor even as this publican †. Such, instead of being grieved at the faults or failings of others, seem rather to rejoice in them; as they give them an opportunity of talking, and of publishing their own merits. But charity rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth ‡.

VOL. I.

P

The

* Matth. vii. 3. 5.

† Luke xviii. 11. 13, 14.

‡ The truth here meant, is that which is practical. For from the contrast, it is clear, that the word is used in this place in the same sense in which it is used by John; I have no greater joy than to hear that my children walk in the truth; Epist. iii. ver. 4.

The conduct of the poor publican was very different from this. He had seen his own heart; and his prayer is not the language of self-exaltation or detraction, but of confusion and contrition. He stood afar off, and would not lift up so much as his eyes to heaven, but smote upon his breast, saying, God be merciful to me a SINNER. And it is declared, that this man went down to his house justified, rather than the other; that is justified, while the other was condemned. For that this is the sense of the expression, is evident from Christ's application of the parable to his hearers: Every one that exalteth himself shall be abased, and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted.

HE who hath seen his own heart by the light of the Spirit, perceives so much evil in it, that he finds little time to contemplate the defects of others. When he sees transgressors he is grieved, because men keep not God's law. When their actions are doubtful, he endeavours to put the best construction on them they can bear; knowing that charity believeth all things, hopeth all things, and thinketh no evil, where it can find any room to think good of the person or action.—When the evil nature of the action is evident, he endeavours to view all the alleviating circumstances attending it; and from the knowledge of his own heart, reflects, that had his temptation been as strong, he might have done as ill, perhaps much worse. He always finds so much wickedness in his inward part, that he is ashamed to be harsh or uncharitable to others. He knows, that were God to leave him but for a moment, he would instantly follow their example. Therefore, if a brother be overtaken in a fault, he tries to restore him in the spirit of meekness, considering HIMSELF, lest he also be tempted. Our Lord, by his answer to the Scribes and Pharisees, when they brought him a woman taken in adultery, taught them the necessity of knowing their own hearts, that they might learn mercy and compassion to others. He said unto them; He that is WITHOUT SIN among you, let him first cast a stone at her. This reproof was so penetrating, that it had a present effect on them all, by making them ashamed. For they who heard it, being convicted by their own conscience, went out one by one, beginning at the eldest even unto the last *.

10. NECESSARY as an excellent guard against Satan's temptations. As he is the great adversary of our salvation, it is a leading branch of the Christian warfare to resist his attacks; and the complete defeat of this foe will constitute an eminent part of the saint's victory. To the attainment of this victory the knowledge of our own hearts is absolutely necessary. As Satan is well acquainted with them, and knows all our corruptions; to them he applies himself in a special manner, that, if possible, he may accomplish our ruin. The lusts of the heart are his great instruments. He still endeavours to blow up the fire of corruption within us into a flame. The predominant sin in every man, is the weapon that he principally wields against him for his destruction. This pretender to God's empire in our hearts, hath always a disaffected party within us; and, for gaining his end, at least in so far, he hath nothing more to do than to stir this up to actual rebellion against God. Our corruptions are just the devil's forces, which, notwithstanding the many defeats he meets with by the power of Divine grace, he still rallies again, and brings on the field with renewed impetuosity. Were it not for these lusts that dwell in our hearts, Satan could have no power over us. He was entirely baffled and routed in all the attacks that he made on our great Head, whether in the desert, or in the garden, immediately after his baptism, or during his dreadful agony; because he had no sin, no inward principle to work upon. Therefore Christ declared his defeat, even before he made the assault: The prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in me †. If Satan had nothing in us, nothing of his own, nothing in opposition to God; he would depart from us, as unsuccessful as he did from Christ. But he hath a powerful host within us ready for his reception.

* John viii. 7. 9.

† John xiv. 30.

reception. What will ye see in the Shulamite, but as it were the company of two armies? It is therefore necessary that we be well acquainted with our hearts, that we may, in the strength of grace, resist Satan when he makes his attacks. We are exhorted to watch and pray, that we enter not into temptation *. Our watching is especially to be directed to our hearts, to the lusts that war there; because it is among these enemies of our own household that Satan will raise his head: and we can only improve the knowledge of our hearts aright, by intreating the Lord's protection and guardianship. For except the Lord keep the city, the watchman watcheth in vain †.

II. NECESSARY for the revival of the Lord's people in a time of spiritual bondage. Christians are subject to sad declensions from the exercise of godliness. They are sometimes dried and withered like the grass; as bones scattered at the grave's mouth; they have as little activity, and seem to have as little life as dead men's bones; or, as when one cutteth and cleaveth wood upon the earth ‡. They appear to be as sapless and useless as the splinters of wood that fly from the ax; or, as the words may be rendered, as when one cutteth and cleaveth the earth. They seem to meet with as little regard or compassion from God, as the earth does from the husbandman, when it is plowed up by him. Now, the knowledge of their own hearts necessary to their revival; for it is generally because of the indulgence of some secret lust, that they are deprived of the sense of God's love, and of the comforts of communion with him. It is only by obtaining farther acquaintance with their hearts, that they can find out that lust, that hidden enemy which offends God and deprives them of his presence. Therefore, Asaph, when he was in so mournful a situation, by the hiding of God's countenance, that his fore ran in the night and ceased not; that his soul refused to be comforted; that he remembered God, and was troubled; that he complained, and his spirit, instead of being

* Matth. xxvi. 41.

† Psal. cxxvii. 1.

‡ Psal. cxli. 7.

being revived, was overwhelmed within him; that his eyes were held waking, and he was so troubled that he could not speak;—had recourse to his own heart, most probably to discover the procuring cause of the Lord's contending. These are his words: *I commune with mine own heart, and my spirit made diligent search: Thus did he endeavour to find out that heart-plague which deprived him of all comfort, and made him even question the loving-kindness of the Lord. And he was successful in his inquiry. He found that unbelief was the plague. And I said, This is mine infirmity. As it is the duty of Christians, under desertion, to review their hearts with the greatest care, to subject them to the most rigid scrutiny, to endeavour to search out all the lusts that rage there, and especially that particular lust which hinders their peace, and earnestly to supplicate the direction and counsel of the Spirit, who knoweth and searcheth the heart; it is generally in this way that the Lord recovers them from backsliding. He, by the motions of his Spirit, stirs them up to self-examination, and anew opens up their hearts to them in their vileness and wickedness, discovers their particular plagues, and so brings them back to himself. Then he hears this pleasant declaration from his backsliding children, when overcome by a sense of his love, and of their own unworthiness, as from repenting Ephraim: After I was instructed, I smote upon my thigh. Then he speaks in this comfortable manner of them: Is Ephraim my dear son? is he a pleasant child? for since I spake against him, I do earnestly remember him still; therefore my bowels are troubled for him: I will surely have mercy upon him, saith the Lord†. This was the exercise of David, after he got an affecting view of his great transgression; Against thee, thee only have I sinned; and therefore he prays; Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me‡. The Lord declares that in this manner he would deal with his ancient people, after eminent defection from himself; Therefore, behold, I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness, and speak comfortably

* Psal lxxvii. 6.

† Jer. xxxi. 19.

‡ Psal. li. 4. 10.

comfortably unto her; or, speak to her heart, by a discovery both of her sin, and of her deliverance from it. I will give her the valley of Achor for a door of hope. Achor, signifying bitterness, is here figuratively used to denote true sorrow for sin. It follows, as the fruit of this; *She shall sing there as in the days of her youth, and as in the day when she came up out of the land of Egypt. The Lord brings back his people to himself, by exciting them to renewed acts of faith and evangelical repentance, proceeding from a renewed discovery of the heart; and he gives them a new influx of joy, like that which they felt in the day of espousals, when first delivered from the worse than Egyptian darkness and bondage of sin. Indeed, the knowledge of the heart is essential to the very being of a saint, and to all right exercise.

12. NECESSARY for convincing us of the wisdom, justice, and love displayed in all Divine dispensations. As long as a man continues ignorant of his own heart, he remains a stranger to the operations of God's hand towards him. When afflicted, either he views not the rod as sent because of his iniquities, or he complains of it as heavier than these deserve. He is ready to lay with Cain; My punishment is greater than I can bear. He presumes, at least in heart, to accuse God of folly, injustice and cruelty in his dispensations. The reason of this arrogance is, that he has no just idea of the desert of his sins; far less of their evil and abominable nature. Therefore this is the improvement of afflictions which God requires of sinners, that thence they learn the evil and bitterness of sin; that they apprehend the wickedness and malignity of their iniquities, by the severity of their punishment. Thine own wickedness shall correct thee, and thy backslidings shall reprove thee: know therefore and see, that it is an evil thing and bitter, that thou hast forsaken the Lord thy God, and that my fear is not in thee, saith the Lord God of hosts †. Indeed the influence of Divine dispensations, and of the knowledge of the heart is mutual. By the dispensations fations of Providence concurring with the Word efficaciously applied, we see the evils of the heart: and by the knowledge of these evils we perceive the justness of those dispensations. That the dispensations of Providence are instrumental in discovering the evils of the heart, is evident from these words already mentioned; Thine own wickedness shall correct thee, and thy backslidings shall reprove thee:—and that the knowledge of the evils of the heart, on the other hand, is subservient to the discovery of the justness of these dispensations, appears from the words of Moses to the children of Israel; Thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God hath led thee, these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart *. They were to make use of that sense which they had of their sins, that humbling and affecting sense which was the fruit of the Lord's dealing with them, as a mean of convincing them of the wisdom, justice and love of God, in continuing them so long, and afflicting them with so many severe dispensations in the wilderness, for the purpose of accomplishing this heart-humiliation.

* Hos. ii. 14, 15.

† Jer. ii. 19.

THE children of God perceive a display of wisdom in these trying dispensations; because when ordinances have been ineffectual, he makes these successful. They see justice in them, because they deserve infinitely more on account of their sins. They also discover the greatest love in them, because God hath their salvation in view, and because their trials are attended by the power of the Holy Spirit for this end. Therefore, though at first under these dispensations they are as a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke, spurning and fretting under them, viewing them rather as destructive than as healing; yet when the blessing attends them, they are made to speak and think in a very different strain, saying unto God; Turn thou me, and I shall be turned, for thou art the Lord my God. Then they know that it is surely meet to be said unto God,

* Deut. viii. 2.

God, I have born chastisement; I will not offend any more: that which I see not, teach thou me; if I have done iniquity, I will do no more. The afflictions of wicked Manasseh were blessed as the means of humbling him, and discovering to him his own heart; and the fruit of this humiliation was a persuasion of the equity and mercy of the Divine procedure. For when he was in affliction, he besought the Lord his God, and humbled himself greatly before the God of his fathers, and prayed unto him: and he was intreated of him, and heard his supplication;—then Manasseh knew that he was God*.

13. THE saving knowledge of the heart is farther necessary, as a mean of obtaining deliverance from personal afflictions. We are not to imagine that it is in any degree the meritorious cause. This knowledge can have no merit before God. For if it be of a saving kind, it proceeds from him alone; it is his own free gift. But it may safely be considered as a mean employed by the Spirit, preparatory to the removal of trying dispensations. This is evidently implied in the passage before us:—What prayer or supplication soever be made by ANY MAN, who shall know the plague of his own heart,—then hear thou in heaven thy dwelling place, and forgive, and do, and give to every man according to his ways, whose heart thou knowest; or, as the words may be, and are translated by some, Then thou WILT hear, thou WILT forgive, &c. for they may not only be understood as a prayer, but as a prophecy. Afflictions are often sent to the unconverted, and in subserviency to the word, sanctified for turning them to God; according to his promise, I will cause you to pass under the rod, and I will bring you into the bond of the covenant. As it is often the Lord's design in sending affliction to bless it, for bringing them into union with himself; when this end is served, he, in mercy, removes the affliction. To this purpose is the testimony of the Church,—Such as sit in darkness, and in the shadow of death, being bound in affliction affliction and irons; because they rebelled against the words of God, and contemned the counsel of the Most High:—they cried unto the Lord in their trouble, and he saved them out of their distresses*. The Lord severely afflicted Manasseh because of his sin, and as a subordinate mean of the conversion of this vessel of mercy. He deprived him of his kingdom, and loaded him with bonds and fetters in Babylon. This affliction he blessed, for shewing him his own evil heart, and the wickedness of his ways; and when he was brought truly to know and confess his iniquities, the Lord delivered him from adversity. For it is declared, that when he was in affliction, and humbled himself greatly before the God of his fathers; he brought him again to Jerusalem, into his kingdom †.

* 2 Chron. xxxiii. 12, 13.

This is especially the case with the children of God. When displeased with them, he applies the rod to excite them to search their hearts, and try their ways, for discovering the causes of his controversy. When they are made to know their iniquities, and to bewail them in an evangelical manner, he often removes the stroke of his hand. He withdraweth not his eyes from the righteous;—if they be bound in fetters, and be holden in cords of affliction: then he sheweth them their work, and their transgressions, that they have exceeded. He openeth also their ear to discipline, and commandeth that they return from iniquity. If they obey and serve him, they shall spend their days in prosperity, and their years in pleasures ‡. Christians, these afflictive visitations are all in love; and you ought to be more concerned about the sanctification than about the removal of them. But it is lawful for you, in submission to the Lord's will, to pray for deliverance from adversity, when, by means of it, your compassionate Father hath accomplished his gracious purposes. If thou return unto the Almighty, thou shalt be built up; thou shalt put away iniquity far from thy tabernacles. Thou shalt make thy prayer to him, and he shall

VOL. I.

Q

* Psal. cvii. 10, 11. 13. 17.—20.

† 2 Chron. xxxiii. 12.

‡ Job xxxvi. 7.—11.

shall bear thee.—When men are cast down, then thou shalt say, There is lifting up; and he shall save the humble person *. Job was a striking instance of the truth of this. For when he was humbled before the Lord, and made to know more of his heart, to acknowledge that he had uttered what he understood not, things too wonderful for him, which he knew not,—and to abhor himself, and repent in dust and ashes;—the Lord turned again his captivity; chap. xlii. 3. 6. 10. Of the same import is the declaration of God by the Prophet Hosea; I will go and return to my place, till they acknowledge their offence, and seek my face: in their affliction they will seek me early †. Nay, sometimes the Lord, in dealing with his people, employs a conviction of their sinful courses as a comfortable preventative of that affliction, to which he would otherwise subject them. When they have dishonoured him by sin, and, from a due sense of it, are humbled before him, in mercy he averts the chastisement they have deserved; because the end which he hath always in view with respect to them, is already gained by the operation of the Spirit, in bringing them to repentance. God never inflicts the rod on his children, but when it is necessary. He chastens, not for his pleasure, but for their profit. When truly humbled for their iniquity, he not only often withholds the rod, but returns to them with great loving-kindness. Thus he addresses his backsliding people, to show how unwilling he is to afflict them; Return thou backsliding Israel, saith the Lord, and I will not cause mine anger to fall upon you; for I am merciful, saith the Lord, and I will not keep anger for ever. Only acknowledge thine iniquity, that thou hast transgressed against the Lord thy God:—Turn, O backsliding children, saith the Lord, for I am married unto you ‡.—Christians are often excited to concern about sin, and to an ardent desire of pardon, more immediately from an apprehension of the deserved chastisement, than from a sense of its evil. They are more, in such a situation, under the influence of fear than than love. But the Lord, in infinite sovereignty and condescension, uses even this more unworthy motive in them for awakening them from that security and obduracy which naturally follow sin, and by suggesting motives of a filial and evangelical kind, gradually brings them to genuine repentance.

* Job xxii. 23. 27. 29.

† Hof. v. 15.

‡ Jer. iii. 12, 13.

You who are yet strangers to your hearts, may, from what hath been said, learn the necessity of purity and peace of conscience. Your consciences are defiled by sin. But apply to the blood of Jesus Christ, that they may be sprinkled, that thus they may be without offence, both towards God and man. Seek peace of conscience. Is not this power often disturbed and distressed with a sense of your guilt, and fear of eternal indignation? You can only enjoy peace by an application to the blood of the Lamb: for he hath made peace by the blood of his cross. Perhaps, you find no trouble from your consciences. It may be, they are fear'd and hardened through the deceitfulness of sin. You have got them so quieted, that they seldom or never reprove you. But, O sinners! consider that it is a delusive peace. It is all a dream. It cannot be lasting. You will have an awakening sooner or later. And if mercy do not interpose, your temporary, short-lived peace will issue in an eternal war with conscience. This is that worm that dieth not, that shall for ever gnaw the hearts of sinners in hell. All whose consciences are not savingly awakened under the sound of the gospel, shall experience a tremendous awakening by the sound of the last trumpet, when it shall be said, Awake, thou that sleepest, and come to judgment. Consider that this is a destructive peace. It is working for your everlasting ruin, like the repose that a man takes on the brink of a precipice, before he is dashed in pieces. *At the last it biteth as a serpent, and stingeth like an adder.—Yea, thou shalt be as he that lieth down in the midst of the sea, or as he that lieth upon the top of a mast. This peace is like the sleep of a mariner upon a topmast,

in

* Prov. xxiii. 32. 34.

in the midst of a dreadful storm. The next billow sweeps him into eternity. This is only saying peace to yourselves, while there is no peace. For there is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked. It is saying peace and safety to yourselves, while sudden destruction cometh upon you, as travail upon a woman with child, so that ye shall not escape. That you may attain this delightful peace of conscience, this true, abiding and saving peace; be exhorted to apply to God for a discovery of the evil of your hearts, and an interest in the blood of sprinkling: for otherwise you can only bring a scurf over the sore, whilst the plague remains in all its virulence and malignity.—Consider that there is a dreadful filth in sin, which is one reason why it is called a plague. Seek to have the pollution of your persons purged away by the Spirit of Christ, applying his blood for cleansing you; and to be delivered from that shame which flows from a sense of guilt, and which is the inseparable concomitant of pollution, that you may have boldness before God.

THOSE who are truly acquainted with their hearts, should labour for a revival in the time of spiritual bondage. Be not satisfied, while the Lord hides his countenance. Search out the plagues of your hearts, that you may come to Christ with the finger on the sore; like Esther, when she touch'd the golden sceptre, saying, The adversary and enemy, is this wicked Haman. Be frequent and fervent in prayer for a farther discovery of your hearts; that you may see more reason to bless the Lord even for your trials, to acknowledge that in truth and righteousness he hath afflicted you; and to say, Blessed is the man whom thou chastenest, O Lord, and teachest out of thy law.

S E R M O N VII.

ON HEART-KNOWLEDGE AS CONNECTED WITH NATIONAL REFORMATION AND DELIVERANCE.

I KINGS, viii. 38.

—Who shall know every man the plague of his own heart.—

THERE is nothing that a man will not more readily believe than any thing bad about himself. How quick-sighted soever he be to the faults of others, and even to those of his nearest friends, he is, in a great measure, blind to his own. The reason is; man naturally worships self, and puts it in the place of God. He is especially unwilling to believe any thing to the prejudice of his heart. He will far more readily allow faults in his practice. For as self is an idol that receives universal homage, the heart is its temple, and it seems highly sacrilegious to charge it with defilement. Such an imputation is a stroke at its dominion. Thence when men cannot deny or even palliate the vices of their lives, they lull themselves with the pleasing idea of the goodness of their hearts: and the character of a good heart, when bestowed on any one, is reckoned a powerful apology for a very wicked practice. But it is one great design of God, in the revelation of his will to sinners, to cast down this cursed idol. Therefore our Lord represents self-denial as the first lesson of Christianity. If any man will be my disciple, let him deny himself.

In the preceding discourse we have illustrated the necessity of knowing the plague of the heart, from its

its inseparable connection with the purification and peace of conscience ;—for enabling us to form a right and impartial judgment of our state before God ;—as a powerful incitement to charity towards others ;—as an excellent guard against the temptations of Satan ;—for the revival of the children of God in a time of spiritual bondage and declension ;—for convincing them of the wisdom, justice and love displayed in all Divine dispensations ;—and also as a mean of obtaining deliverance from personal afflictions.

14. THIS knowledge of the heart is necessary to all true national reformation. The generality of men think in a very trivial manner on this subject. If a day of general fasting and humiliation be observed by the nation, it is considered as all that is necessary ; nay, by many, as a kind of atonement for all national sins. But as the one is not only a very superficial, but a very unjust view of the matter ; the other is impious. There are many essential ingredients in true national reformation ; among which we may reckon the following.

1. It is necessary that the members of a nation should as individuals know, and be duly affected with their own particular sins, and especially with the sins of their hearts. This Solomon supposes to be indispensably requisite to all genuine public repentance : What prayer or supplication soever be made, by all thy people, who shall know every man the plague of his own heart.—Many are apt to look upon national sins as something that they have little connection with, something that they are not immediately concerned in ; as if a nation itself were some kind of existence different from the individuals that compose it. But what is a nation ? Is it not a society of individuals, united by a common form of government, and by the same laws ? Is not every person in this society a constituent member of it ? Can we therefore think of national sins, without viewing them as committed by the persons that compose this nation ? They become national, when committed or acceded to by the generality, or, at least, by the leading part of the nation. When this is the case, every individual, except in as far as he does his utmost against them, is concerned in the guilt, and exposed to the punishment. Single persons being then the constituent members of a nation, it follows that national sins derive their very being from individuals, and only become national, as they are committed or approved by the bulk of single persons who constitute the nation. But as public sins originate from private persons, it is therefore necessary that every man should know his own sins; and as the sins of every individual take their rise from his heart, it is not sufficient to a thorough national reformation, that every man should have some general acquaintance with his own sins. It is necessary that every man know the plague of his own heart. All sins, whether public or private, spring from this bitter and polluted source. National corruption may be compared to a corrupt tree. The branches represent the different individuals in the nation, every one of which hath his share in the general corruption; and the root, with which all the branches are connected, may represent the heart, from which the corruption of all these individuals springs. Thus national reformation can only be said to begin at the root, when it begins at the heart. Therefore, when the Lord would describe a thorough reformation in the case of Israel under public calamities, he declares that they should be on the mountains, like doves of the vallies, all of them mourning, every one for his iniquity *.
the

2. EVERY ONE should know, and be deeply grieved for the particular share that he has had in the general trespass. It is not enough that individuals know the plague of their own hearts, or view their iniquities, as accumulating the general guilt. They ought to consider the active hand they have had with others in national trespasses. Every man should be acquainted with his own guilt, whether it hath been discovered by sinful

* Ezek. vii. 16.

sinful silence, or by personal instrumentality; by unfaithfulness in not reproving, or endeavouring, according to his station, to prevent or punish the sins of others; by following others in their courses of defecation; or perhaps, by taking a lead in the general transgression. Can we really view the rejection of the precious gospel as a national iniquity, without considering our partnership in guilt, by the abuse of our distinguishing privileges, by our obduracy under the dispensations of grace? Can we consistently look on the breach of solemn covenant-engagements as an eminent part of national guilt, without judging with regard to ourselves, how far we have dealt unfaithfully in God's covenant? Can we be truly convinced that security under judgments is one of our public sins, without acknowledging that our own hearts afford the most affecting evidence of the general infatuation? Shall we pretend to confess that carnal confidence is another bitter ingredient, filling up the cup of our iniquity, and calling for a cup of trembling from the hand of the Lord; if we do not, at the same time, confess that we have often been ready to distrust our God, and to look for deliverance from an arm of flesh? Can we sincerely lament the mournful prevalence of every species of iniquity; without remembering how little we have endeavoured to stem the torrent by our fervent prayers, faithful warnings, and holy example? The Lord complains of all professions of public repentance as deceitful and unacceptable to him, if they are not attended with this particular inquiry. *I hearkened and heard, but they spake not aright; no man repented him of his wickedness, saying, What have I done? General confessions, even of general iniquity, are in God's sight nothing but evasions. Although a man should confess public sins with the greatest particularity possible, yet unless he confess them as his own, according to the hand he has had in them, it is nothing but a superficial and deceitful acknowledgment.

* Jer. viii. 6.

3. There must be a joint, public and particular confession of national sins. Solomon takes this also for granted in his prayer, ver. 47. If they shall bethink themselves in the land whither they were carried captives, and repent, and make supplication unto thee,—saying, We have sinned, and have done perversely, we have committed wickedness,—then hear thou.—If sins become national, as being committed by the leading, the representative part of a nation, by the bulk of its members in a social capacity, or as overspreading the generality of a nation; they must be confessed in as public and social a capacity as that in which they were committed. When the Lord raised up Ezra, and afterwards Nehemiah to be instrumental in the reformation of his people, *there assembled out of Israel, a very great congregation, and jointly confessed their sins, and all the people wept. Therefore when God would bring his backsliding children to repentance, he commands that all orders of persons should meet in a solemn assembly, for confessing their sins, and imploring his mercy. Gather the people, sanctify the congregation, assemble the elders, gather the children, and those that suck the breasts. Let the priests, the ministers of the Lord, weep between the porch and the altar, and let them say; Spare thy people, O Lord, and give not thine heritage to reproach †.—Nor is it enough that this confession be social and public; it must also be particular. Nations, in their pretended reformations, most frequently satisfy themselves with a general acknowledgment of sin, and profession of sorrow for it. But there ought to be a distinct and explicit enumeration of the causes of provocation. In this manner was the High-priest, by the express command of God, to make confession on the head of the live goat, on the great day of atonement. He shall confess over him ALL the iniquities of the children of Israel, and ALL their transgressions in ALL their sins ‡. In all the examples of the most general and apparently sincere reformations among God's ancient people, we may

VOL. I.

R

* Ezr. x. 1.; Neh. viii. 9. † Joel ii. 16, 17. ‡ Lev. xvi. 21.

may observe great particularity in mentioning those sins that were most offensive to their God. When he was wroth, because they had rejected him from being king; they entreated Samuel to *pray for them, that they might not die; for, say they, We have added to all our other sins this evil, to ask us a king. In the fast proclaimed by Ezra, the people made a particular confession of the newly discovered guilt of mingling with the heathen †. Nehemiah particularly confessed the guilt of persons of different ranks in Israel. Neither have our kings, our princes, our priests, nor our fathers kept thy law, nor hearkened unto thy commandments, and thy testimonies, wherewith thou didst testify against them. For they have not served thee in their kingdom, and in thy great goodness that thou gavest them, and in the large and fat land which thou gavest before them, neither turned they from their wicked works †.

4. THIS must be attended with a confession of former iniquities, of the iniquities of our fathers. Many will be ready to say; “What have we to do with these? They must answer for themselves, and not we for them.” But the sins of our ancestors are like a debt lying on any subject. You know that, in law, he who intronits on a subject becomes liable for all the debt. So, we serve ourselves heirs to the guilt of our forefathers by our own iniquities, by continuing in the practice of the same sins, or of others that resemble them. In this case, we sin WITH our fathers; or, LIKE them, we prove a stiff-necked and rebellious race. But either way, we materially approve of all that they have done against God. National sin is metaphorically represented as a swelling tide, which rises higher and higher, by the instrumentality of the children in adding to the iniquity of their fathers: Our iniquities are INCREASED OVER our heads. It is compared to the growth of a tree, which becomes taller and stronger every year, till at length it hides its top in the the clouds.—Our trespasss is GROWN UP unto the heavens *. When the children walk in the steps of their fathers, the guilt is accumulated, and the cry of it waxes louder and louder. This increase of guilt is compared to the growth of man from infancy to maturity, or described, at least, as something growing up with him. In this manner, national sin gathers strength by the activity of one generation after another. We have sinned against the Lord our God, saith the Prophet Jeremiah, we and our fathers, from our YOUTH even unto this day †.

* 1 Sam. xii. 19.

† Ezr. ix. 10. 14.

‡ Neh. ix. 34, 35.

Now, it is just with God to punish the children for the iniquity of their fathers, when they claim it as their own by walking in their ways. Not only does the Scripture uniformly declare, that our God visits the iniquities of the fathers upon the children, even unto many generations of them that hate him; but reason itself assents to the equity of this procedure. For a nation must still be viewed as one great whole, without regard to difference of time, or change of the individuals that constitute it: as it is still esteemed the same river, that comes from one source, and retains one channel and course, although every moment there is the succession of a new body of waters. There is even a considerable difference between the relation that a child bears to his immediate parent, and that which succeeding generations bear to the preceding in a nation. Although the child shall bear his father's iniquity, if he follow his example, yet the guilt is more immediate in the case of a nation. For when the individual parent is dead, the person is gone, and quite a different one succeeds. But the nation must still be viewed as the same, without regard to the change of persons. It could never, at any period of time, be said, as in the case of individuals, that the nation is properly altered; because, although there be a succession of generations, it is gradual and indiscernible. Thus the Lord often addresses the same people, as if they were still the same persons persons with the generation before them. Even from the days of your fathers, ye are gone away from mine ordinances *. To the same purpose, the whole time of God's forbearance, and of the continuance of a dispensation of grace with a wicked nation, is represented as one day; because the nation itself is viewed as one whole, without regard to succession:—All day long have I stretched out my hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people. The guilt of children is highly aggravated above that of their fathers, if they continue in the same ungodly courses; because the iniquity of their fathers is held up to them as a beacon to deter them from following their wicked example. Therefore, it is only in the exercise of cordial confession, lamentation and repentance that we may warrantably look for deliverance from the guilt of the iniquity of our fathers: for, saith the Lord, Behold it is written before me; I will not keep silence, but will recompence, even recompence into their bosom, your iniquities, and the iniquities of your fathers together. And why recompence the iniquity of the fathers into the bosom of their children? Because they continued in the same sins:—your fathers, who have burnt incense upon the mountains, and blasphemed me upon the hills; THEREFORE will I measure their FORMER work into their bosom †. So Christ informs the Pharisees, that by killing the Prophets whom he would send, they would fill up the measure of their fathers, and bring upon themselves all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel to the blood of Zacharias ‡. Accordingly we find, that in all the national confessions of Israel, they connected the iniquity of their fathers with their own §.

* Ezr. ix. 6.

† Jer. iii. 25.

5. It is necessary that there be a joint and cordial application to the blood of Christ for remission. Why does Solomon so frequently mention in his prayer that temple which he had built? Why does he so particularly particularly intreat, that God's eyes may be open towards that house night and day; even towards the place of which he had said; My Name shall be there; that he may hearken to the prayer which his servants should make towards that place, verſe 29.? Why does he ſpeak of it, in the verſe immediately under conſideration, as not only neceſſary that every man ſhould know the plague of his own heart, but what would ſeem rather to weaken the climax, as being, in a comparative point of view, a matter of far leſs moment, that he ſhould ſpread forth his hands towards that houſe? Why does he limit the answer of the prayer of thoſe who might be in a ſtate of captivity, by requiring that they ſhould pray towards their land, and towards the houſe built for God's name? In a word, why does he aſſume this as an indiſpenſable requiſite in every one of the caſes ſuppoſed? Could there be any charm in looking to the temple, or towards the land where it ſtood? Could prayer be in itſelf more acceptable from one quarter of the heavens, than from another? No, ſurely. All places are in themſelves alike to that God, whoſe is the earth-and the fulneſs thereof, who fills heaven and earth. But this limitation typically declared the abſolute neceſſity, in every age, of having the eye of faith directed to Him, the vail of whoſe fleſh was prefigured by the literal temple; to Him, who in very deed hath dwelt with man upon earth, although heaven, yea the heaven of heavens cannot contain him, the neceſſity of approaching God in every duty through the Word made fleſh. Their eyes were to look to that place of which Jehovah had ſaid, My Name ſhall be there, only in relation to that great Prophet, who was to deſtroy the temple of his body and raiſe it up again, with reſpect to whom he had long before given them this warning. Beware of him and obey his voice, for my Name is in him.*

* Mal. iii. 7. † Isa. lxxv. 6, 7. ‡ Mat. xxiii. 32.—35.
§ 2 Chron. xxix. 6. Ezr. ix. 7. Psa. cvi. 6, 7. Neh. ix.
16.—29.

It is to be lamented, that in our public profeſſions of repentance, there ſhould be ſo great a prevalence of a ſelf-righteous ſpirit; that our confeſſions, and prayers,

* Exod. xxiii. 21.

prayers, and supplications should be considered as the meritorious cause of the removal of God's anger,—or as means to recommend ourselves to his mercy ; while the eye is but faintly directed to the only propitiation. Repentance of so legal a nature, instead of ensuring the supposed ends, of expiating our sins and averting the Divine indignation, unspeakably increases our guilt, and subjects us to that awful curse pronounced by the mouth of the Prophet Isaiah ; Wo to the rebellious children, saith the Lord, that take counsel, but not of me ; and that cover with a covering, but not of my Spirit ; that they may add sin to sin *. This legal conduct is a confirming evidence of our rebellion against God. It is an obstinate rejection of his counsel ; a weak attempt to screen ourselves from the tremendous effects of his anger, by a covering as feeble as a spider's web. Nay, it is only an adding of sin to sin, of renewed guilt to that formerly contracted, of the sin of our own defiled righteousness to the sin of our unrighteousness. This sin is doubly hateful and dishonouring to God, because it is committed under the pretence of atoning for former guilt, and appeasing incensed justice. How extremely different is this conduct, from that commanded by him whose name is Counsellor, in his address to the lukewarm Church of Laodicea ; I counsel thee to buy of me white raiment that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear † ! He counsels us to accept of his own perfect righteousness as our covering from the piercing eye of Divine Justice. But we prefer the counsel of our own hearts, and of Satan ; and cover ourselves with a covering, although not of his Spirit. But our repentance can never be of a right kind, unless it entirely renounce itself, as the ground of acceptance with God ; and be attended with a believing appropriation of the blood of Christ as the only atonement for sin, as the only meritorious cause of Divine mercies. Never will public repentance be agreeable to the commandment of God, till there be a united

* Isa. xxx. 1. † Rev. iii. 18.

united and cordial application to this blood of sprinkling, every man knowing the plague of his own heart, and his particular hand in the national guilt; being affected with abounding sins, and the sins of former generations; and thus, under a conviction of the necessity of this precious blood to wash away sin, improving it for his own iniquities, and pleading its efficacy for those of his people. This is intimated to us by the typical ordinance of the scape-goat among the Israelites. On the great day of atonement, the High-priest was to lay both his hands upon the head of this goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat, and to send him away into the wilderness *. Thus a whole people ought not only to confess their sins; but, in the exercise of faith, to transfer them over to Christ, who was typified by the scape-goat; that they may be no more remembered.

6. NATIONAL reformation implies solemn public vowing to God. When he at first espoused the Israelites to himself, he brought them into a covenant of duty. This they often renewed, after being chargeable with great apostasy. Indeed, we have scarcely an instance of any remarkable reformation among them, or effusion of the Holy Spirit on the Church of Israel, without the performance of this duty. In the history of that great reformation, accomplished by means of Hezekiah, it is not expressly said, that they entered into covenant; but we find the king himself declaring, It is in mine heart to make a covenant with the Lord God of Israel, that his fierce wrath may turn away from us †. We do not say that the express form of an oath is absolutely necessary; but sure we are, there can be no true public reformation without the substance of the duty. And this much we find in that reformation: For in Judah the hand of God was to give them one heart, to do the commandment of the king, and of the princes, by the word of the Lord.

* Lev. xvi. 21.

† 2 Chron. xxix. 10.

Lord *. But, in general, the very form was strictly observed. Joshua, before his death, made a covenant with the people, in which he took them engaged to adhere faithfully to God †. That worthy priest, Jehoiada, who was the instrument of reclaiming Israel from the worship of Baal, made a covenant between the Lord, and the people, and the king, that they should be the Lord's people ‡. It hath been often objected, that “the example of Israel is not binding on us, because covenanting was peculiar to them on account of the theocratical nature of their government; and was simply their oath of allegiance to God as their king, even in a political capacity.” It is indeed granted, that this was the nature of their government, and that it is therefore without a parallel. But it does not necessarily follow, that the duty of which we speak was inseparably connected with the theocracy. For God declared the theocracy to be dissolved on the part of the people, when they asked a king like the rest of the nations. Thus he said to Samuel, who judged Israel, when he was displeased at their proposal: They have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them §. And although it would seem that the Lord did not entirely dissolve it on his part, yet, if the duty of swearing to him had been indispensably connected with that kind of government, no covenant could have been owned by him, which, like that of Jehoiada, and several others, admitted of an earthly king as a party. Had this solemn oath only or principally respected God as king of the Jewish state, the very admission of another into such an oath, would have made the whole void; for he must have accounted this oath of allegiance to him an insult, when, at the very time, an earthly political head was acknowledged. But whatever general reference this duty had to the judicial, undoubtedly it especially respected the moral law. The only thing particularly mentioned by Joshua, in the covenant that he made,

is

* 2 Chron. xxx. 12. † Josh. xxiv. 25. ‡ 2 Chron. xxiii. 16.

§ Sam. viii. 7.

is the worship of the true God in opposition to that of idols*. It is undeniable from the consequence, that this was the thing especially in view in Jehoiada's. For they immediately broke down the images of Baal. Those made by Aza and Josiah were of the same nature †. We are far from saying, that these covenants excluded the ceremonial institutions. In the circumstances of that people, no covenant could have been acceptable with God that did so. They were as much bound to refer to these as we are to our more spiritual ordinances. Nor is it denied, that, in some instances ‡, such solemn engagements expressly contained a judicial penalty, arising from the nature of their dispensation. But the temporal penalty could no more affect the essence of the covenant itself than a penalty affixed to any contract among men can alter its nature. The penalty was merely an addition, suited to their peculiar situation, and entirely distinct from the obligation itself. For the very idea that a penalty suggests is, that something else is the matter of the engagement (a).

VOL. I.

S

THIS

* Josh. xxiv. 15. † 2 Chr. xv. 12. ; xxiii. 3.—14. ‡ 2 Chr. xv. 13.

(a) There is reason to apprehend that some are enemies to this duty, because they cannot in their minds separate the idea of public vowing from that of persecution. But if this duty was ever meant, under the New Testament, as an instrument of violence, it was grossly perverted; and in as far as it hath been thus employed, it hath been dreadfully abused. The Israelites were bound to punish errors in doctrine by civil pains, because, according to the peculiar nature of their government, heresy was treason against their King. But the kingdom of heaven is, in its whole form and administration, at an unspeakably greater distance from the kingdoms of this world, than the legal dispensation was. So far is the King of Zion from giving any encouragement to violence, that it is his unalterable decree, that all they that take the sword, shall perish with the sword *. It is by no means the character of the Christian Church, but of Antichrist, and it is his condemnation also, that he that leadeth into captivity, shall go into captivity, and he that killeth with the sword, must be killed with the sword †. If the religious opinions of any man do not necessarily endanger the state, that rule certainly applies; To his own master he standeth or falleth. And if any one think otherwise, let him answer that question; Who art thou that judgest another man's servant ‡? There is but one

* Mat. xxvi. 52. † Rev. xiii. 10. ‡ Rom. xiv. 4.

THIS duty was also eminently blessed of God at the Reformation from Popery. There is scarcely a Protestant Church that hath not engaged in it. Often in this land hath it been a mean of reviving, or of establishment. Our fathers, when leaving the bosom of the Roman Church, in this manner devoted themselves to God. And in later times, when the Church was groaning under the yoke of Prelacy, after a few had been led to this duty, in a short time the greatest part of the nation, with those of our neighbouring kingdoms, willingly offered themselves to the Lord. It hath, indeed, become fashionable, not only with the enemies of religion or liberty, but with many who are the declared friends of both, to run down the enthusiasm of that period, and indiscriminately to hold up the characters and conduct of the principal actors to derision. But such persons consider not, that it is to those very men, whose characters they so wantonly abuse, whose conduct they, while at ease, so rashly condemn, that under providence they are indebted for that religious and civil liberty which they enjoy; that their treasure and blood were the price of those invaluable rights, which they daily boast of, and which other nations envy. We wish not either to deny, or to palliate the excesses of some, who were once engaged in this cause, and afterwards manifested that their hearts were not right with God, or the infirmities of those worthies whom God raised up for such arduous work; although much might be pleaded from the necessity of the times, and from the intimate connection of the natural and spiritual rights of man. But unquestionably there was then a more eminent effusion of the Spirit on the Church of Christ in this land, than either former or later ages have known, and many dated their conversion from that period, who afterwards appeared as eminent witnesses for Jesus, and testified their sincerity by resisting unto blood.

THAT so little is said on this head in the New Testament, one Lord of conscience. There is but one Lawgiver, who is able to save, and to destroy: and the natural inference from this is, Who art thou that judgest another? Jam. iv. 12.

tament, need not seem surprising, when it is so clear as a moral duty from the Old, and the subject of many promises that undeniably respect the Gentiles in gospel-times. Some learned writers, indeed, who appear not to have had this duty expressly in their eye, have proved that the word *, sometimes rendered profession †, and sometimes confession ‡, almost invariably signifies a covenant, and that these words, Let us hold fast the profession, should be translated, Let us hold fast the covenant of our faith §. It seems also difficult to understand the following words in another sense: This they did, not as we hoped, for first they gave their own selves to the Lord . We cannot imagine that this is meant of the ordinance of the supper, because it was so frequently dispensed in the Apostolic age, that it could never be matter of surprise to an Apostle to find a Christian Church engaged in it. Nor can it with any shadow of reason be supposed to have been a covenant entered into at the formation of these Churches, as particular congregations. Not only does Paul, in the beginning of the chapter, design them the churches of Macedonia; but it undeniably appears, from the Acts of the Apostles, that they were regularly constituted long before; nay, that they were planted and established, even before there was a Church among the Corinthians themselves, to whom Paul thus relates their conduct. Were these words to be understood of a covenant confined to the first framing of a Christian Church, they would imply a very gross absurdity,—that Paul expected they should have made a liberal contribution to the Christians at Jerusalem, before they were properly Christians themselves, and that he was agreeably surprised it was otherwise.

SUFFICE it to say, that there are other things retained among the generality of Christians, without dispute, which might bear fully as much as the obligation of this duty. It is evidently, a reasonable service, agreeable to the ordinary practice of Christians, * ὁμολογία. † 1 Tim. vi. 12.; 2 Cor. ix. 13.; Heb. iii. 1.; x. 23. ‡ 1 Tim. i. 12. § Vid. Wolfii Cur. Philolog. in 2 Cor. ix. 13.; Heb. iii. 1.; x. 23.  2 Cor. viii. 5.

stians, in their secret exercise ; nay, to the established method of procedure among men, as to moral obligations. When a Christian hath departed from God, in the indulgence of sin, he renews his engagements to him in the strength of promised grace, and vows that henceforth he will not go back. If Job did right in making a covenant with his eyes, because they had been instruments in sinning, and snares to his imagination, by administering fuel to corruption ; it must be the duty of all those who have enticed one another to sin, or encouraged one another in it, mutually and jointly to engage, in the most solemn manner, that they will do no more wickedly.

WHEN subjects have broken their oath of allegiance to a Prince, he, on their return to him, requires new engagements, and devises stronger bonds, if possible, than those that they have formerly broken. Is the King of Zion the only Sovereign who hath no right to require the strongest obligations from his subjects ; to bind them to his service by every moral tie which is of force with the human mind ? It is strange, indeed, that men, who in the most common transactions of life, cheerfully submit to solemn oaths, and to a frequent repetition of them ; who so often invoke God as a witness and judge, should be so reluctant to deal with him as a party ; that those, who without hesitation will swear to man as oft as he pleases, should revolt at the idea of swearing so much as once, to the Lord of Hosts !

7. THIS reformation must be practical. When Solomon prays for a merciful deliverance to his people, if led captive into the land of the enemy ; he not only supposes that they should repent, and make supplication, and confess, saying, We have sinned, and have done perversely ; but that they should renounce the practice of those sins, which had procured Divine vengeance. This is evident from the following words in verses 48. and 49. ; If they shall—RETURN unto thee with all their heart, and with all their soul—then hear thou. This is more fully expressed in the

the parallel passage, 2 Chron. vi. 27.—Hear thou from heaven, and forgive the sin of thy servants, and of thy people Israel, when thou hast taught them the GOOD WAY wherein they should walk. A change of course, as well as a change of heart, is included in all true repentance. Our pretended repentance is but a solemn mockery of God, unless it include practical reformation. Therefore, when the Lord exhorts the Church of Ephesus to repent, he exhorts her also to forsake her sins: Remember therefore from whence thou art fallen, and repent, and do *. All repentance, destitute of this, is in God's account only holding fast deceit, and refusing to return †. He complains of this as a demonstration of the deceitfulness of Israel, in their professions of repentance, that they turned not from their wicked courses ‡. When he slew them, then they sought him; and they returned, and enquired early after God. Nevertheless they did flatter him with their mouth, and they lied unto him with their tongues. They turned back and tempted God:—they tempted and provoked the Most High God, and kept not his testimonies. In all the examples of real reformation among that people, we find that their professions of repentance were attended by a turning from their wickedness. In the time of Ezra, they not only confessed their sins, but separated themselves from the people of the land, and put away their strange wives §. In the reformation accomplished by means of Nehemiah, they separated from Israel all the mixed multitude; they sanctified the house of the Lord, which had been profaned; the portion of the Levites, which had been withheld, was given them; they also turned from profaning the Sabbath; and the strange wives were again put away .—Thus it appears, that unless national repentance hath all the qualities of genuine personal repentance, it is not of a right kind: and it is reasonable to think so, because the circumstance of its being national cannot alter the

* Rev. ii. 5. † Jer. viii. 5. ‡ Psal. lxxviii. 34. 36. 41. 56.

§ Ezr. x. 11.—19.

 Neh. xiii. 3. 8. 9. 12. 19. 28.

the nature of the duty itself, but only gives a greater extent to its exercise.

IN the last place we observe, That this is the surest way of obtaining deliverance from outward plagues and public judgments. This course is pointed out by Solomon, in the prayer before us, verse 37. If there be in the land famine, if there be pestilence, &c.—then bear thou;—or as it may justly be said, then thou wilt bear. For this is not to be viewed as a prayer only, but also as a promise and prophecy of that conduct which the Lord would observe towards his people. The same is declared by Jehosaphat, when he had proclaimed a fast, and assembled all Judah before JEHOVAH, to implore his protection from their enemies*. If when evil come upon us, as the sword, judgment, or pestilence, or famine, we stand before this house and in thy presence (for thy Name is in this house) and cry unto thee in our affliction, then thou wilt bear and help. Afterwards we find him addressing the people in this manner; Hear me, O Judah, and ye inhabitants of Jerusalem, Believe in the Lord your God, so shall you be established †. And the Lord fought for them, and turned their enemies one against another; and when they looked unto the multitude; behold they were dead bodies fallen to the earth, and none escaped. But this declaration of Solomon had the highest attestation possible; for it was confirmed by an immediate revelation from God himself ‡; and the Lord appeared unto Solomon that night, and said unto him, I have heard thy prayer.

THROUGH the whole Scriptures, God recommends this repentance of the heart as the most proper course for eviting national calamities. So he speaks by Moses to Israel: But if thou shalt seek the Lord thy God, thou shalt find him, if thou seek him with all thy heart, and with all thy soul. When thou art in tribulation, and all these things are come upon thee, if thou turn to the Lord thy God, and shalt be obedient to his voice, (for the Lord thy God is a merciful God), he will

* 2 Chron. xx. 9. † 2 Chron. xx. 20. ‡ 2 Chron. vii. 12.

will not forsake thee, neither destroy thee, nor forget the covenant of thy fathers, which he swore unto them *. This course Samuel recommends unto Israel, as that in which they were to expect deliverance from their enemies: If you do return unto the Lord with all your heart; then put away the strange gods from among you, and prepare your hearts unto the Lord, and seek him only; and he will deliver you out of the hand of the Philistines †. So the Lord speaks by Jeremiah: If so be they will hearken, and turn EVERY MAN from his evil way, that I may repent me of the evil which I proposed to do unto them, because of the evil of their doings ‡. Indeed, the Lord is so compassionate, and so unwilling to destroy, that he hath often averted impending judgments from a guilty people, when their reformation was only of an external kind. This he did with regard to the Israelites, even when their repentance was feigned and hypocritical. When he slew them, then they sought him. Nevertheless, they did flatter him with their mouth, and they lied unto him with their tongues: For their heart was not right with him, neither were they stedfast in his covenant. But he, being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity, and destroyed them not; Psa. lxxviii. 34, 36, 38. Although the reformation of the Ninevites was only external and temporary, yet the Lord spared them. God saw their works, that they turned from their evil way; and God repented him of the evil, that he had said he would do unto them, and he did it not §. But this kind of reformation is not attended by a removal of the Lord's anger. He may suspend the stroke; but he does not avert it altogether. For all this his anger is not turned away; but his hand is stretched out still. The punishment is not remitted. It is only suspended for a time: And, we may add, the longer that judgments are delayed, the more heavy are they when inflicted. Thus, it is declared, Lev. xxvi. 23. If ye will not be reformed by these things, but will walk contrary unto me:

* Deut. iv. 29, 31. See also ch. xxx. 1, 10. † 1 Sam. vii. 3.

‡ Jer. xxvi. 3. See also ch. xviii. 7, 6. ch. xxxvi. 3.

§ Jonah iii. 10.

me : then will I also walk contrary unto you, and will punish you yet seven times for your sins. Although a person or people break off their sins by an outward righteousness, and their iniquity by shewing mercy to the poor ; yet it is only a lengthening of their tranquillity*. This was the case with Nineveh. For, although the Lord spared it at that time, when they outwardly repented at the preaching of Jonah, yet he destroyed it not long after ; as was particularly foretold by Nahum in his prophecy. When Elijah had denounced the judgments of God against Ahab, that wicked king rent his clothes, and put sackcloth upon his flesh, and fasted, and lay in sackcloth, and went softly. And because he humbled himself, although only in a legal and external way, God brought not the evil in his days. But the judgment was only delayed. For the Lord said, In his son's days will I bring the evil upon his house †.

WE see, then, that it is only such a public reformation as is described in the words of our text, when every man knows the plague of his own heart, that is succeeded by a real deliverance from threatened, impending, or inflicted judgments ; and that the calamity can only be deferred for a little, when the reformation is merely external. We may consider the doctrine as applicable to us, in the present melancholy situation of affairs. It must naturally have occurred to every thinking person in this nation, that God hath, this season, been threatening us with his three great judgments, the Sword, the Pestilence, and the Famine ‡. The Sword has not only been threatened ; but it has actually desolated our borders. During the progress of a long and fatal war, many thousands of our countrymen, and many thousands of our brethren on the other side of the Atlantic, have fallen victims to its cruel devastations. Our once victorious fleets have turned their backs to their enemies : and the desired haven hath been the tomb of many of our

* Dan. iv. 27. † 1 Kings xxi. 27, 29.

‡ This Sermon was preached in November 1782.

our mariners. There has been a general apprehension of an invasion from some foreign foes: and if we judge of the justness of our fears by the greatness of our demerit, we must conclude that we have too much reason for these apprehensions. If we compare them with God's awful threatenings, denounced in like circumstances, we may well tremble. For this is his declaration: I will bring a sword upon you, that shall avenge the quarrel of my covenant *. This season we have also been threatened with the Pestilence. A contagious disorder hath prevailed, which, if it hath not swept off many, has yet infected the greatest part. Can we here pass over in silence the mercy which the Lord mixes with his judgments? This stroke has been very gentle, as if it were a premonition of a far more severe visitation, if we continue in our sins; and, at the same time, a loud call to avoid farther calamity, by turning to the Lord our God. Whatever physical theories may be formed about this disease, we must ultimately resolve our difficulties by one of a religious kind,—the anger of the Lord against a guilty people. And if we go on in our national trespasses, unquestionably we have the greatest reason to dread more tremendous displays of his indignation in this manner. For, in the same passage in which he threatens the Sword to avenge the quarrel of his covenant, the Pestilence also is denounced: If you will not be informed by me by these things,—when you are gathered together within your cities, I will send the pestilence among you, and you shall be delivered into the hand of the enemy. Can the most ignorant or hardened among us be blind to the Lord's controversy with regard to the harvest? He hath been evidently frowning through the whole season. Do we not already feel the effects of his judgment in this respect? And do not the present gloomy appearances forbode that we shall feel them with greater severity? At any rate, although the Lord should be pleased to prevent our fears in the issue, the present dispensations of his Providence wear a very threatening aspect, and loudly declare, that if we be not visited with Famine, it is only because he is slow to anger, and doth not stir up all his wrath. In this respect, the Providence of God concurs with his Word. For in the passage already referred to, not only are the Sword and Pestilence threatened, but Famine also. And when I have broken the staff of your bread, ten women shall bake your bread in one oven; and they shall deliver you your bread again by weight; and ye shall eat it, and not be satisfied. Are we then threatened with judgments so awful? Do we already feel them in some measure? And shall we not consider these things as a call to turn to the Lord by national repentance? You see the only way in which this repentance can be real, in which you may expect a merciful deliverance from judgments. It is by turning to him with the heart, by knowing every man the plague of his own heart. For if there be in the land famine, if there be pestilence, blasting, mildew, locust, or if there be caterpillar: if their enemy besiege them in the land of their cities; whatever plague, whatsoever sickness there be: what prayer and supplication soever be made by any man, or by all thy people Israel, who shall know every man the plague of his own heart, and spread forth his hands towards this house: then thou wilt hear in heaven thy dwelling-place, and forgive, and do, and give to every man according to his ways, whose heart thou knowest. The Lord promises, that when he is intreated in this manner, he will *forgive their sin and heal their land. Every one of you should be active, according to your different stations, in promoting reformation among others. If the nation should still continue obstinate in wickedness; yet, as individuals, and as a congregation professing to witness against the defections, both of former, and of present times, it is your duty to return to the Lord, by searching out every man the plague of his own heart, and saying, in deep contrition, What have I done? Thus, you will at least deliver your own souls; and perhaps the Lord may may spare you in the day of public calamity. You should also be earnest in prayer, that he may bring others to repentance, that he may turn the nation in general to himself, and thus turn from the fierceness of his anger against us. Seek, that the Lord may give you the same spirit and exercise with the Prophet Jeremiah, and that his language may be really yours: O! that my head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night for the sins of the daughter of my people.

* Lev. xxvi. 25.

* 2 Chron. vii. 14.

WE shall conclude the discourse with some more particular improvement of the subject.

WE infer, 1. The necessity of searching the heart. We have endeavoured to illustrate the necessity and usefulness of the knowledge of it. Now, the evidences of the necessity of this knowledge are just so many arguments for self-examination. For we can only expect acquaintance with our hearts in the path of commanded duty. And we are expressly enjoined to examine them carefully by the word, depending on the promised direction of the Spirit. The Lord often, in a sovereign manner, discovers to a sinner his heart, when he is in a state of security and indifference. But it is incumbent on us to be in the use of instituted means; and God hath appointed this, of self-examination, as a special mean for attaining the knowledge of the heart.

2. THAT it is by the heart that God judgeth of a man's profession of religion. He does not estimate the worth of religious duties by their multitude, by the apparent fervency of the worshipper, or by the time spent in the performance of them. But he tries whether they proceed from the heart. Often a poor weak prayer is accepted of him, as flowing from the heart; when another, delivered with the greatest fluency of diction and warmth of natural affection, is rejected, because it proceeds not from this source. These services only are acceptable to him, in which the spirit is engaged. Therefore, he here requires the knowledge of the heart as necessary to every kind of prayer prayer or supplication. God judgeth in a very different manner from man. For the Lord seeth not as man seeth: for man looketh on the outward appearance; but the Lord looketh on the heart. We judge of a man's heart by his profession, taken in conjunction with his deportment; but God judgeth both of a man's profession, and of his deportment, by his heart.

3. THAT the Lord employs different means in bringing men to the knowledge of their hearts. The ordinary stated mean, under the influence of the Spirit, is the Word. But if persons continue to reject this, when God is about to turn them to himself, he often visits them with the rod. Personal or public afflictions are sometimes sanctified for this purpose. The Lord can make famine, or sword, or pestilence efficacious, where the Word has long been rejected. This is supposed in the words of our text, viewed in their connection. But even when sinners are brought to know themselves by means of the rod, it is attended by, and used in subserviency to the Word, which is the great ordinance of God for salvation.

FROM this subject, you, who have obtained a saving acquaintance with your hearts, may be exhorted.

1. To cultivate this acquaintance. You, who are God's children, have indeed seen them; but you have not seen all their wickedness, nor can you see it all in this world. You must attain perfection in knowledge, before you can justly know the former evils of your own hearts. In that happy place, where you shall be completely delivered from their plagues, you will see with the clearest light the unspeakable evil of them. There you will look back on them with safety, when you are brought through fire, and through water. Did the Christian in this world see all the wickedness of his own heart, it would be in danger of driving him to despair. But although you cannot now fully discover this mystery of iniquity, it is indispensably incumbent on you to be still pressing after farther knowledge of it; and, for this end, to be much engaged in self-examination. This is not merely necessary when you are about to make solemn approaches to God. It should be your daily exercise. Corruption is still working in your hearts. You should, therefore, still keep a strict eye on it, and diligently investigate its workings. Sometimes it changes its manner of operation, and takes a new channel. It appears to the believer in an unexpected form. When it thus changes its appearance, he is in danger of being overcome, before he observe its machinations. The frequent exercise of self-examination will greatly assist you in prayer. Thus you will know what you need to ask of God, what blessings are most suitable to your present necessities, what iniquities you need especially to have subdued. It will tend greatly to keep the conscience pure, and without offence. It will also be an excellent help to the exercise of mortification; and to this exercise we would also

2. EXHORT you. It is not enough that you seek farther acquaintance with your hearts. You must more and more strive for the destruction of their iniquities. Beware of thinking that sin is sufficiently subdued. If you indulge this idea, you will certainly fall before your lusts. If you imagine that your mountain stands strong, and that you shall never be moved, you will provoke the Lord to hide his face. The Israelites were commanded to carry on war with Amalek from generation to generation. Sin is a spiritual Amalek in your hearts, with which you must not even make a truce. There must be no cessation of arms in the Christian warfare. In this sense we may apply the word of the Lord by the Prophet Jeremiah; *Curfed be he that doth the work of the Lord deceitfully; and curfed be he that keepeth back his sword from blood. Self-examination may be considered as an hand-maid to mortification. Therefore, when you have discovered the plagues of the heart, you should bring them anew to the cross of Christ, that you may be crucified with him, and so live. For, if ye do mortify

* Jer. lviii. 10.

tify the deeds of the body, ye shall live. Mortify therefore your members which are on the earth, and be concerned wholly to put off the old man with his deeds. But beware of attempting this duty in your own strength, either natural or spiritual. It is only through the Spirit that you can mortify the deeds of the body. On every renewed discovery of sin, make a renewed application to the blood of the Saviour. Thus you will receive a daily pardon of the guilt contracted against God as your Father, and daily intimations of that irrevocable pardon, which hath formerly been intimated to your consciences, the sense of which you are apt to lose by your transgressions. Always, when you see or feel your plagues, as being stung by the fiery serpents of sin, turn the eye of faith to the Son of man, who was and is lifted up.

BUT here, perhaps, some doubting person may inquire, "How shall I know if I have obtained a saving acquaintance with the plague of my heart?" In answer to this, you may attend to the following things. As it is our duty to endeavour to strengthen the weak hands, and confirm the feeble knees, and also ministerially to separate between the clean and the unclean; so, dear brethren, it is your duty to try yourselves, while we mention some scriptural evidences for this purpose. If you are savingly acquainted with the plague of your own heart, you have seen it to be hateful, as being contrary to the holy God, to his nature, and to his law; as being the very reverse of infinite purity. You hate sin, because it is that abominable thing which God hateth. You have seen yourselves to be miserable on account of it. You have been convinced that you were exposed by sin to the wrath and curse of God, both in this life and in that which is to come. But, notwithstanding the destructive nature of sin, you desire to hate it, more because it is abominable to God, than because it is ruining to yourselves. It is not so much a discovery of its danger, as of its evil, that makes you abhor it. You loathe yourselves on account of this plague. You cannot not look on yourselves, as finners, with any satisfaction. Like Job, you abhor yourselves, and repent in dust and in ashes. You are fully convinced that you cannot recover yourselves from it; that, as soon might the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots; that all your washings could never make you clean; that they could only defile you the more. You have seen Christ as the only remedy. You are persuaded that there is nothing, either in heaven or on earth, that can wash away the guilt and the filth of your sin, but the blood of Jesus; that there is not another name under heaven, given among men, by which you can be saved. You are willing to embrace him as your remedy. You adore the wisdom and the love of God, in providing one so infinitely precious; and it is the unfeigned and earnest desire of your hearts, to receive him, who is come in the name of God to save you. You could not think of parting with Christ, of renouncing all lot and portion in him, for ten thousand worlds. You desire to claim him, in the seraphic language of the Psalmist; Whom have I in heaven but thee, and there is none in all the earth that I desire besides thee. You wish to apply to the fountain of his blood, that you may be washed from all sin, and from all uncleanness. The plague of the heart is your daily burden. It is the greatest grief that ever you had in the world, that you so greatly dishonour God. While in this tabernacle, you groan, being burdened: you experimentally know the propriety, the peculiar emphasis of the Apostle's language, O! wretched man that I am; and who shall deliver me from the body of this death? In a word, it is your constant aim to get sin mortified and subdued. You daily endeavour to come to the cross, that your corruptions may be nailed to it. There is no lust whatsoever in your heart, that you wish to spare. Those that are most pleasant to the old man, you especially want to have destroyed. The sin, that to the unrenewed part is precious as a right eye, you endeavour to pluck out; that which is useful as a right hand, hand, you strive to cut off, and cast from you. Your dependence is on the promise, He will subdue our iniquities. This you make your plea at the throne. Is this the state of thy heart, desponding disciple? Then thou mayest safely conclude, that thou art indeed truly acquainted with its plague. Sin shall not have dominion over you, for you are not under the law, but under grace.

THOSE who are still unacquainted with their own hearts may be exhorted to try the duty of self-examination. While engaged in this duty, in obedience to the command of God, he may be pleased to give you a saving discovery of them. Whether this should be the result or not, it is, at any rate, your indispensable duty; for you know that God requires it: Examine yourselves, prove your own selves, know ye not your own selves, how that Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates? The importance of the duty, and the difficulties attending the due performance of it, instead of discouraging you, should be improved as motives not only exciting you to try it, but to use the greatest diligence and earnestness. Both the importance of the duty, and its concomitant difficulties are implied in this threefold exhortation. The very expressions used denote the necessary diligence. The word rendered prove is a metaphor taken from the trial of metals by the touchstone or otherwise. Therefore, it intimates the accuracy and impartiality which are requisite in this investigation. As the Israelites were obliged to search their houses, before eating the passover, lest any fragment of leaven should be any where concealed; so you must assiduously search your hearts for the discovery of every sin. Take the word of God for your rule. This is the standard by which you must judge of your hearts. To the law, and to the testimony: if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them. This word is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart.— Earnestly pray for the Holy Spirit as your guide. Say unto God, O! send forth thy light and thy truth,
the

the light of the Spirit to attend the truth of the word. It is his promise, *I will put my Spirit in you, —then shall ye remember your own evil ways. I will remember my covenant with thee,—that thou mayest remember and be confounded, and never open thy mouth any more, because of thy shame; when I am pacified toward thee, for all that thou hast done, saith the Lord God. Engage in this duty with due deliberation. It must not be done carelessly. Consider that your eternal all is at stake. You should chuse a proper time and place, without incurring the danger of interruption or distraction. Try yourselves as in the presence of God, and endeavour to get your spirits impressed with an awful sense of his omniscience. Remember that he addressess you in this manner; Be still, and know that I am God.—When you have done all you can in the way of duty, acknowledge the unprofitableness of your service; and be concerned to roll the work on God himself, pleading that he would accomplish it for you. Let this be your prayer; Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me, and know my thoughts.—Whatever discoveries you obtain of your hearts, come to God in earnest prayer for the destruction of their plagues; and endeavour a cordial application to the blood of Christ, both for justification and sanctification; that the body of sin may be destroyed, that henceforth you may not serve sin.

* Ezek. xxxvi. 27,—31. Ch. xvi. 62, 63.

S E R M O N VIII.

ON THE ATHEISM OF THE HEART.

PSALM XIV. I.

The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God.

HE that cometh unto God, saith the Holy Spirit, must believe that he is. Without a firm persuasion of his being and perfections, there can be no acceptable worship. That service which proceeds not from faith in God, according to the revelation that he hath given of himself in the Word, is no better than idolatry: for although we profess to worship the true God, if we do not really believe in him as such, it is the same as if we worshipped a false god. Now, idolatry in God's account is nothing better than atheism; because if we do not worship the true God, strictly speaking we worship no God at all; for an idol is nothing in the world. Therefore the Spirit of God represents the idolatrous Heathens as Atheists. They are said to be without God in the world, or, as the expression is, according to the original, Atheists in the world. Thus it appears that the worship offered to God that flows not from faith in him, according to his own revelation, is the creature of our own fancy. Nay, it is a solemn mockery of the Majesty of heaven, and a profanation of his blessed name under the pretence of honouring it. If we apply this rule to the services of the greatest part of gospel-hearers, it is to be feared they will be found wanting. For the heart is naturally a sink of atheism. Therefore the Holy Spirit gives this affecting description of the natural man; The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God.

THE person spoken of is said to be a fool. This phrase, as here used, is not to be confined, according to its full meaning, to one who is really deprived of the exercise of reason. We must understand it of the sinner;—not merely of him who is addicted to the habits of vice, and to a life of gross impiety; but of every one who is under the power of the natural wickedness of his heart, under the dominion of sin, or in an unrenewed state; although his life should be externally sober and blameless. And in this sense it is most frequently and almost universally used in Scripture. So it is said, Psal. xlix. 10. The fool, and the brutish person perish;—and, Eccles. ii. 14. The fool walketh in darkness. In both these places the expression evidently denotes that folly which is of a spiritual kind. Do men in general reckon him a fool, who, in the concerns of this life, gives himself up to indolence, indifference and prodigality; while they confer the character of a wise man on him who, by honest diligence, endeavours to provide a sufficient sustenance for himself and family? With far more reason is the man whose mind is so engrossed by the trifles of time that he neglects eternity, in a spiritual sense pronounced to be a fool; as opposed to him, whose labour and anxiety are especially engaged about that portion, which is large as the unlimited desires, and lasting as the endless duration of his soul. It is declared of this spiritual fool, that he hath said in his heart, There is no God. These words do not express the persuasion of the sinner, but his affection and desire. He is not convinced that there is no God, but he wishes that there were none. Thus, the expression may be strictly and literally read as a wish or desire; The fool hath said in his heart, No God. For the words, there is, are a supplement. He says it in his heart. For few will dare to avow it to the world. Ask the unregenerate man, if he believes the existence of a God? He will be enraged at the question, as offering him the highest insult. Yet God, who cannot err, directly directly charges him with atheism. It is observable here that he is not introduced as saying, There is no JEHOVAH, this being that name which peculiarly denotes the existence of God. But the language ascribed to him is, There is no Elohim. This word in the original denotes God as the Governor of the world; and the use of it here expresses the wish of the sinner that there were no Providence, that God did not observe his conduct, and that he would not call him to an account.

THE words thus viewed afford the following doctrinal proposition; That every unrenewed man is under the power of atheism.

THE plan we propose in discoursing from them is,

I. To make some general observations on the subject;

II. To endeavour to show that every natural man is under the power of atheism; and,

III. To illustrate the consequences of this inward depravity.

THE first thing proposed is to make some general observations on the subject.

I. It may be observed, that there cannot be a speculative atheist in the world. By a speculative atheist we mean one who is firmly convinced in his mind that there is no God. Many, under the temporary influence of Satan's temptations and power of their own corruption, have called in question the existence of a God. But we cannot believe that there ever was any person in his senses who, for any length of time, disbelieved this great and fundamental truth. Some men, from the wickedness of their hearts, have tried to make others believe that this was their creed; but we are persuaded, that even then, amidst all their pretensions, they have found it impossible to shake their minds loose of their convictions of the being of God. There are so many invincible demonstratious
of

of this truth, that the human mind, in its worst state, cannot entirely resist their force.—The works of Creation contain so powerful a demonstration of the existence of the Supreme Being, that a man must wilfully shut his eyes, ere he can presume to deny it. The whole of his works are so wonderful, and so exactly correspondent to the end designed in their creation, that we must necessarily acknowledge that they could never be produced by any creature, and that they could only be the effect of infinite power concurring with infinite wisdom. It is not consistent with reason to suppose, that this creation, so regularly and beautifully disposed, could have been cast into its present form by a fortuitous concurrence of atoms, as some have pretended. Blind chance could never be the cause of effects so universally well-ordered. They could proceed from an intelligent Being only: and this Being can be no other than God.—The works of Providence are also a demonstration of the existence of God. Who, but an infinite Being, could support the world in the utmost regularity for such a long course of ages, although constantly exposed to destruction by the force of devouring elements, which carry on a perpetual war against each other, and seem to threaten the universe in general? God's dealings with man in his moral government declare his being and presence. Wickedness does not in this life pass unpunished; for men would thence conclude that there was no Providence. Nor are all evil actions punished; lest men should infer that there was no state of retribution. But there is such a mixture of mercy and justice discernible in the management of the world, that there is evidently much reserved for a future state, both in the way of reward and punishment: and, at the same time, there are such instances of righteousness being rewarded, and of wickedness being punished, even in this life, as clearly to manifest that there is a God who judgeth in the earth.

THIS

THIS truth is further demonstrated by the tendency of all earthly things to destruction. For, when we see our fellow-creatures in general daily perishing around us; the greatest kingdoms and empires, after gradually arriving at the summit of their glory, falling to ruin; immeasurable oceans washing themselves away by their perpetual action; and the earth on which we tread mouldering down to destruction, or consuming itself by its own fires;—we are laid under the necessity of concluding, that there must be some one great cause and last end, who, as he hath at first given being to this universe, is gradually unhinging its frame and bringing it forward to dissolution. Job seems to have had this view of matters. He speaks as one fully satisfied that the constant changes of this lower world were a convincing proof of the being and agency of a supreme cause. The waters fail from the sea, and the flood decayeth and drieth up.—And surely the mountain falling cometh to nought: and the rock is removed out of his place.—The waters wear the stones: THOU wasthest away the things which grow out of the dust of the earth, and THOU destroyest the hope of man *.—To find a proof of the existence of a Deity, man needs not go farther than himself. He cannot attentively view the structure of his body, which is formed with such singular wisdom, and discovers so much beauty and regularity; or consider the powers of his soul, which place him so far above the brute creation, and capacitate him for enjoyments so ineffably superior to any thing this world can afford; nor can he contemplate the admirable union of two principles so exceedingly different as gross matter and pure spirit; without exclaiming with heart-felt astonishment; I am fearfully and wonderfully made. Nor acting as a rational creature, can he withhold this inference; He that built all things is God.

THE dictates of conscience also afford the same testimony. There is a witness in man's breast, proclaiming this great truth, which all the subtilty, labour

* Job. xiv. 11, 18, 19.

bour, and ingenuity of man, will never be able to silence. Whence proceed those terrors of conscience, which the most wicked men, even such as have gloried in atheism, have felt at times, but from an inward conviction, and Divine impression on their minds, of the existence of God? This is a witness, which, however it may be silenced for a time, will speak out to the confusion of the sinner, sooner or later. This is so convincing an argument, that heathens themselves cannot resist its influence. For the Apostle declares, that the Gentiles, who have not the law, are a law unto themselves; which shows the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the mean while accusing, or else excusing one another *.—This is a truth that receives the consent of all nations. However different from each other, or false in themselves their notions on this subject, no nation has ever been found that did not believe the being of a God. Some, indeed, proceed so far in absurdity and impiety, as to worship the Devil. But even this horrible extreme demonstrates their secret conviction of the existence of some invisible Power, totally distinct from chance or secondary causes, to whose agency the prosperous or calamitous events of life must be ascribed.

2. THERE have been, and there are many heart-atheists. By this designation we mean those, who, although they do not in their judgments disbelieve this fundamental doctrine, yet ardently wish in their hearts that they had no ground to believe it. A sense of sin, and a conviction of its desert, have, by reason of their unbelief, produced this impious wish. When men consider themselves as atrocious transgressors of God's law, as rebels against the Sovereign of heaven and earth, they feel a desire that there were no God to observe their conduct, and to punish them for it. The sinner, from his violent attachment to a course of iniquity, is apt to imagine that it would be a happy thing for him, were this the case; for then
he

* Rom. ii. 14, 15.

he would have full scope in sin; he would act the brute without any restraint, and without any sting from conscience; he would cautiously endeavour to escape punishment from men, and he would be delivered from the appalling apprehension of any other. He would be content to die the death of a beast, whose spirit goeth downward, that he might enjoy without any interruption, the envied life of a beast. The existence of a God is so ungrateful an idea to a wicked man, that he wishes by all means to get rid of it. Hence it is, that when his conscience accuses him, and threatens him with destruction, instead of attempting a reformation of his life, or inquiring into the real state of his heart, he plunges anew into the mire of iniquity, and wallows there till he has choked all his convictions. This awful truth, which haunts him as his own shadow, he wishes buried in eternal oblivion. Say, guilty sinner, hast thou not sometimes felt such a wish in thy heart? When alarmed by a sense of God's justice, pursuing thee as a wretch obnoxious to everlasting destruction, hast thou not perceived a secret desire in thy soul, discovering itself in such language as this: "O! what a happy thing would it be for me, if there were no God?"

3. THERE are many practical atheists in the world, even among those who make a profession of Christianity. Such men, although they believe the being of God, do notwithstanding live as if there were none; and thus by works deny him. Their life is a practical denial of his being, because it is a life of impiety. In this sense the Psalmist understood it. *The transgression of the wicked saith within my heart, that there is no fear of God before his eyes. It said so within his heart. Their sinful conduct led him to form this judgment concerning them. The wicked are no more impressed by a sense of the presence of the great God, than if he were not the witness and judge of their actions. What shall we think of drunkards, gluttons, profane swearers, Sabbath-breakers, unclean persons, and the like? We must certainly account

* Psa. xxxvi. 1.

account them practical Atheists. They live as if they were never to die. They spend their time, as if there were no eternity to follow. They take up their rest in sensual enjoyments, like that fool, who having filled his granaries, said to his soul; Take thine ease; not reflecting that in a moment their souls may be required of them. It is the language of their conduct, Who is the Lord, that we should obey him? We know not the Lord, neither will we let our lusts and idols go. Depart from us, for we desire not the knowledge of thy ways. Practical Atheists are more inconsistent than mortal Deists, who make the nearest approach to speculative atheism, by denying the mortality of the soul, and a future state. For if men can once persuade themselves that their souls shall perish with their bodies, and that there shall be no awful hereafter, when they must give an account of the deeds done in the body; it is not surprising that they should say to themselves, Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we shall die. But while others profess to believe that God will assuredly reckon with them, and that their souls will endure for ever, either in a state of consummate blessedness, or of inconceivable misery; how astonishing is it, that these affecting and important truths should have no influence on their hearts or lives! They are self-murderers; for they wilfully and resolutely devote their never-dying souls to everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power.

4. EVERY man is naturally an Atheist in heart. The justness of this observation, however degrading to the powers of human nature, which are in general so highly extolled, will evidently appear, if we consider that every man is naturally under the absolute dominion of sin. Now, where sin is, there are all its seeds and branches; and atheism, however shocking, will be found among the rest. This may be traced to the natural depravity of the heart, as its root. By the transgression of God's covenant, our nature became entirely corrupt. It was transformed into a copious fountain of all iniquity. And atheism stands at the head of that black list of sins, which defile the heart of man, and render him guilty before God. This was the first sin that made its appearance in the world. It introduced every other in its train. It assumed the dominion in his heart, before he outwardly transgressed the law. Whence was it that our first parents presumed to eat of that tree, the use of which God had denied them, but from the entrance of atheism into their hearts. They listened to the suggestions of the Devil, and obeyed him rather than God. Their beneficent Creator had given them all earthly blessings, and restricted them only as to one tree in paradise. Satan stepped in with his temptations? Yea, saith he, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden? and, at the instigation of Satan, they disbelieved God; and so they fell. Atheism first stole into their hearts; then it broke forth in their practice; and produced the most baleful consequences to themselves and all their posterity. And as atheism introduced every other sin into the world, there is atheism in every sin that a man commits. As it was the origin of the evil of sin, so the greatest malignity that is in sin consists in this, that it is a stroke at the very being of God. Every sin is an attempt to deprive him of Deity; for it is a rebellion against his sovereign authority and moral government. Sin is a denial of subjection to the law of God, and of consequence a virtual denial of his essence: for unless he be God Supreme, and entitled to universal homage and obedience, he cannot be God.

5. THE natural atheism of the heart is greatly confirmed and increased by continuance in sin. This holds as to every particular corruption. As the seeds of all sin are in every heart, whence is it that in some many of them do not spring up as in others? Either they are sanctified from the womb, and the living principle of sin is thus destroyed as to its reign, ere it acquire strength from habit; or they are laid under greater restraint by common grace ; or sin takes a different channel in them from that in which it appears in others. But while any remain under the dominion of sin, notwithstanding all common restraints, it is always confirmed and increased by practice. If a man be not delivered from the natural power of atheism, it takes a firmer hold of his heart, and spreads its bitter roots more extensively. He who, perhaps, in consequence of a religious education, had in his early years a fear of many sins, a sense of the necessity of prayer and other duties, by gradually yielding to sin, at length proceeds so far as to laugh at the shaking of the spear. Hence it is that some, who at first have only said in their hearts, at length presume to say even with their lips, there is no God. From the history of the fall of our first parent, we have a striking proof of the rapid progress of atheism in the heart. As it entered, in consequence of temptation, by means of a doubt, after outwardly transgressing the law, he shows that he is lost to a sense of the Divine perfections ; for he tries to hide himself, as if the shadow of a few leaves could conceal him from that eye before which hell is naked, and destruction hath no covering. Nay, to such a pitch does atheism rise in his heart, that he lies in the very face of God. He says, I was afraid, because I was naked ; when it was not his bodily nakedness, but the cause of it, that filled him with terror. He even proceeds so far, as virtually to accuse God as the author of sin : The woman, whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat. Since atheism went thus far in its very birth, we need not wonder that in these last times, men who have gone as far on this head, in a speculative way, as the human mind can well go, have dared to exhibit the same charge against their Maker. When, therefore, we speak of natural, or of heart-atheism, we do not intend that principle merely as it at first subsists in the heart, but as confirmed by continuance in a natural state.
greater

6. THERE is atheism in the heart of every Believer. This, indeed, as well as every other lust, is subdued, when the power of sin is broken in regeneration; so that he is not, like the unregenerate, under its dominion. But it still hath, and will continue to have a being in the heart, till the old man be fully destroyed. Nay, at times it greatly prevails. Hence it is that he feels so much distraction, deadness and indifference in the performance of religious duties. Hence he so often offends his God, and even falls into sins which are atrocious in their nature, and attended by very aggravating circumstances; although, for former offences of the same, or of a similar kind, he has been sharply reprov'd by his own conscience, by the convincing influences of the Spirit, and by fatherly chastisements. For were the impresson of the being of God sufficiently powerful, it would prevent him from offending his loving and compassionate Father by the transgression of his law. Thus, we discern atheism breaking out in the exercise of eminent saints, whose lives are recorded in Scripture. From this corruption Asaph seems to have had various assaults. When he saw the afflictions of the righteous, and the prosperity of the wicked, he was in danger of denying the reality of all religion, and for a moment spoke the language of atheism. Verily, I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocence; Psal. lxxiii. 13. But this was only a temporary atheism, unlike to that of the unregenerate, which continues with them as long as they are estranged from God. For this was his exercise, only till he went into the sanctuary of God. Then he understood their end. He also discovered the same atheistical propensity with regard to his own experience, when he said; Hath the Lord forgotten to be gracious; Psal. lxxvii. 7. But he soon learned that this was his infirmity. David gives an account of the working of the same corruption. I said in my haste, All men are liars; Psal. cxvi. 11. But when freed from it, so great is his sense of the mercy and importance importance of the deliverance, that he is at a loss to know what he should render to the Lord for his benefits; because he had delivered his soul from death, his eyes from tears, and his feet from falling.

THE observations already offered on this subject suggest to us the following inference; That the power of sin in the heart of man, must be truly dreadful, and its nature unspeakably abominable, as it practically denies the being of God. This is the greatest affront that can possibly be offered to him. It is the greatest presumption that the creature is capable of, to deny the existence of his Creator, or to wish and desire in his heart that there were no God.

FROM this subject, melancholy as it is, a ray of comfort breaks forth to the children of God amidst all their adversities. For this strange language, There is no God, is that of fools only. The wicked heart would rejoice if this assertion were true. But this, Believer, would be thy greatest grief. It would rob thee of all the sweetness of life, of all thy riches for time and eternity. For this is their foundation, that there is a God; and herein they consist, that this God is thy God. He is thy portion; and were it possible thou couldst be deprived of him, nothing in the universe could supply his place to thee. He is thy God in covenant, engaged to be thine for ever. For he hath said, I will make an everlasting covenant with them, that I will not turn away from them to do them good, but I will put my fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from me. It is thy greatest consolation, that thou canst claim him as thine, and say with assured confidence, This God is my God, and he will be my guide over death. All the perfections of God are on thy side. His wisdom is engaged for thy direction, his power for thy protection, his holiness for thy sanctification; his justice ascertains thy pardon; his love secures the communications of his Holy Spirit to thee; and his faithfulness is pledged for thy preservation in a state of grace, and for thy admision into glory at length.

is

You, whose hearts habitually discover their enmity against God by such impious wishes, may learn from this subject the necessity of entreating a discovery of your natural folly. For this is the source of all these atheistical thoughts and desires. Ask wisdom of God. By receiving this you will have the fear of the Lord. For this is the beginning of wisdom. If you had this fear of God, you would be actuated by a true and firm faith in his being. Plead that he may deliver you from folly, open your eyes to your danger while at a distance from him, reveal himself to you in his dear Son, and make you wise to eternal salvation.

S E R M O N IX.

ON THE EVIDENCES OF HEART-ATHEISM.

PSALMS, xiv. 1.

The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God.

THE world we live in is a world of fools. The far greater part of mankind act a part entirely irrational. So great is their infatuation, that they prefer time to eternity, momentary enjoyments to those those that shall never have an end, and listen to the testimony of Satan in preference to that of God. Of all folly that is the greatest, which relates to eternal objects; because it is the most fatal, and when persisted in through life, entirely remediless. A mistake in the management of temporal concerns may be afterwards rectified. At any rate it is comparatively of little importance. But an error in spiritual and eternal matters, as it is in itself of the greatest moment, if carried through life, can never be remedied; because after death there is no redemption. The greatest folly that any creature is capable of, is that of denying or entertaining unjust apprehensions of the being and perfections of the great Creator. Therefore, in a way of eminence, the appellation of fool is given, by the Spirit of God, to him who is chargeable with this guilt: The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God.

THE II. thing proposed, in the illustration of our text, is to show that every natural man is under the power of heart-atheism.

I. THIS appears from his neglect of religious duties. An open contempt of the external practice of Religion is not universal. Great as the wickedness of the world is, we have reason to thank God that there are still some who call upon his name. Yet aversion to the duties of Religion is natural to all. There cannot be a more certain evidence of this, than the extreme difficulty which religious parents find in prevailing on their children to attend Divine worship. From their early years, they give ample demonstration that this is a work burdensome and unnatural to them; and they gladly embrace every opportunity of withdrawing their necks from the yoke. Any employment whatsoever is exceedingly more agreeable to them than the service of God their Maker. This must, indeed, be partly attributed to their reluctance to restraint of any kind. But while it is undeniable, that this very reluctance is a proof that they are naturally children of disobedience, it must be evident that they give

give more abundant proofs of it with respect to religious duties than any thing else. However short the service, their every look and motion cries out, What a weariness is it? And as aversion to the duties of Religion is natural to all, a great part of men practically discover it by a contempt of the ordinances of Divine appointment, whether secret, private, or public. Thus, it is declared: The wicked, through the pride of his countenance, will not seek after God: God is not in all his thoughts; Psal. x. 4. So great is the pride of the wicked, or unregenerate person, that he wishes to have no superior, to acknowledge no being higher than himself. He wants to be lord of his own conduct. Therefore he scorns to give homage to God. Nay, so great is his impiety, that he would think it too much condescension to pass one thought concerning him: God is not in all his thoughts; or if he deigns at any time to think of God, all his thoughts are pointed directly against him: as the words may be read, Every thought in his heart is, There is no God. This is virtually the language of every thought. And wherefore is it that the wicked man neither serves God, nor so much as properly thinks of him? The reason is, he has no just apprehension of his Being and Providence. He has, indeed, some trivial, abstract, and unaffecting notions about the existence of God. But he does not firmly believe this great truth, that God will call him to an account. This reason is added in the 13th verse of the Psalm formerly cited. There the question is asked, Wherefore doth the wicked contemn God? Attend to the reason assigned: He hath said in his heart, Thou wilt not require it. He flatters himself that God will not reckon with him for his neglect of ordinances and unholy life. We can scarcely imagine that even the greatest part of ungodly men absolutely disbelieve the Providence of God, and a future judgment. For men must have their consciences dreadfully seared ere they can lose all impressions of these great truths. But it is most probable, that whenever these ideas come across their minds, they they treat them as if they were old wives fables. If they cannot really disbelieve a future reckoning, they at least wish to persuade themselves that there is none. In the Psalm in which our text lies, the inspired Penman gives it as an evidence of the atheism of the wicked, that *they call not upon the Lord. They do not acknowledge and adore him in the duties of his own institution. When we see men as backward to bow a knee to God, and filled with as much contempt at the idea, as if they were independent creatures; or, as carefully avoiding a place of worship as if it were a place of infection; we are forced to conclude, that their impious conduct proceeds from the atheism of their hearts, and that they have no just and abiding persuasion of the Divine being and attributes. For if there be a God, unquestionably he must be entitled to adoration; it must be the duty of all his intelligent creatures to draw near to him with holy homage. And, as he ought to be worshipped, it must belong to himself to specify that kind of worship which is most suitable to his nature and agreeable to his will. And, as it must belong to him to require it, it must be our indispensable duty to obey his commandments and observe his institutions; and if we refuse this homage and obedience, it necessarily follows that we have no right impressions of the being of God; as these, wherever they are, will produce religious adoration. Those, then, who deny God that worship which he requires, practically deny his being, because thus only can they acknowledge their faith in him: and they undeniably proclaim it as their secret wish, that there were no God.

2. THE power of heart-atheism appears by hypocrisy. As many demonstrate their atheism by neglecting Religion altogether, others discover it by the manner in which they perform religious duties. They profess to be remarkably serious in their prayers, and praises, and other services. They may perhaps be reckoned great saints by others. But it is all mere

Y

* Verse 4.

mere show. Their hearts were never seriously engaged in any duty. They may, like the Pharisees, even disfigure their faces, that to others they may appear exceedingly devout. But still it is all a solemn farce. There is no truth in their appearances. Whence proceeds this conduct, but from the natural atheism of their hearts? The Apostle gives an account of some *who have a form of godliness, but deny the power thereof. All, who have nothing more than a form of godliness, do actually deny its power. As they practically deny, they show that they do not really believe with their hearts the reality of religion; because theirs consists in a mere form. And by denying the reality of religion, they materially deny the existence of God. For if a mere form be sufficient, then it cannot be God who is worshipped; for God is a spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth. Those who imagine that mere bodily service will be acceptable to him, deny him to be a spiritual being, and so deny him to be God. When he denounces a wo against his ancient people for their hypocrisy, he traces it up to their atheism. Wherefore the Lord said, Forasmuch as this people draw near me with their mouth, and with their lips do honour me, but have removed their heart far from me, and their fear towards me is taught by the precept of men: therefore, behold, I will proceed to do a marvellous work, &c. Then it follows,—Wo unto them that seek deep to hide their counsel from the Lord, and their works are in the dark, and they say, Who seeth us? and who knoweth us †? He considers this as the very language of atheism, Who seeth us? and who knoweth us? and surely with the greatest justice. For men would never presume to offer such an affront to God if they really considered him as their present witness, and as their future judge. The strict observation that God takes of the whole of our conduct, the certainty of a future judgment, and the awful discovery that will then be made of the secrets of the heart,

* 2 Tim. iii. 5.

† Isaiah xxix. 13, 14, 15.

heart, are the arguments used by Christ in dissuading his disciples from imitating the wicked example of the Pharisees in their hypocritical conduct. Beware ye of the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy. For there is nothing covered, that shall not be revealed; neither hid, that shall not be known. Therefore, whatsoever ye have spoken in darknesses, shall be heard in the light *. Our Lord reckoned this exhortation of such importance to his disciples, both for time and eternity, that as the introduction of a most memorable discourse, and at a very remarkable time, when there was an innumerable multitude of people gathered together, insomuch that they trode one upon another, the greatest part of whom he doubtless knew to be actuated by unworthy motives, he particularly addressed these words to the twelve: He began to say to his disciples, first of all, beware ye of the leaven of the Pharisees. As this corrupt leaven is mournfully diffused through the hearts of believers themselves, it calls for their peculiar attention to that natural atheism, which still dwells in them, and which is the source of the other. It is for want of a due impression of the being of God on their minds, that with respect to formality and hypocrisy in religious duties, they have so much reason to complain that their hearts are like a bow that shooteth deceitfully. But in this respect there is a great difference between real Christians and hypocrites. All the services of the latter are performed under the influence of an hypocritical spirit: but with Christians this principle prevails only in part; and in as far as it prevails, it is their habitual burden.

3. THIS corruption of the heart breaks out in the profanity and sensuality of the life. The whole labour of many is merely to gratify their sensual appetites. Carnal pleasure is their highest aim. They travail with iniquity of every kind, they wallow in every species of debauchery; paying no more regard to their immortal souls than if they were as vile as their perishing bodies; nay, far more vile than them. For they treat the soul as if it had been given them

for

* Luke xii. 1—3.

for no other end than to be a drudge to the flesh, in making provision for it, as if it were designed as merely a principle of animation to the body, supplying it with the capacity of brutal gratification. What shall we think of these men, but that they are under the power of heart-atheism? For had they any just notions of the being of God, they would tremble at the idea of living like beasts. There are others, again, who, in their common conversation, profane the holy name of God. They use such freedom with his name, as they would suffer no man to use with their own. They invoke him for blessing, preservation, pity, and mercy in the most irreverent manner. They call upon him to witness the merest trifles. They swear in a rash and unhallowed way by his attributes, by his faithfulness, goodness, and grace. Nay, they take God's prerogative out of his hand, by denouncing his curses against those who offend them. They will even go the length of calling on the devil, as if he, who is the greatest adversary of God, deserved that homage, which belongs to him only.

MANY, instead of keeping the first day of the week holy to the Lord, as he hath commanded, make it a day of idleness, and wander up and down like persons who know not what to do with themselves; or presume to do those works that are lawful only on other days. What can we think of such profaners of God's holy name and day, but that they are under the power of atheism? For were they duly affected with a sense of his being, they would shudder at the thought of taking his name in their mouth in an irreverent manner; and they would call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, and honourable. Can we reckon those sensual persons, who constantly riot in wickedness, any better than Atheists*? There is no fear of God before their eyes. The Psalmist points out atheism as the spring of the sensuality and wickedness of the life; or in other words, the wickedness of the life as the fruit and evidence of the atheism of

* Isaiah lviii. 13.

of the heart *. Men are here represented as having all gone aside, because they have universally in their natural state lost a proper sense of the being of God. Their departure from the way of holiness is the inevitable consequence of that impious doctrine of their foolish hearts; There is no God.

4. By perjury.—This is a sin that awfully prevails among us, and the commission of it is a mournful proof of the power of atheism. An oath is a very sacred thing. It is appointed by God to be an end of all strife. He who takes it, in the most solemn manner calls on God to witness the truth of his testimony, and to inflict all his curses upon him, if he swear falsely. He invokes God both as his witness, and as his judge; and avows his willingness to answer to him for the truth of his declaration. Every oath judicially made is in some sort an anticipation of the final judgment. A man thus cites himself immediately to the bar of God, and practically asserts that he would be nowise afraid to answer him for his conduct in the present instance the next moment. Now, if he swear falsely, it is a striking demonstration of the power of atheism in his heart; for he denies the perfections of the Divine nature. He denies omniscience; for by his perjury, he virtually refuses that God knows his heart. He denies Divine faithfulness; because he calls upon the true God to bear witness to a lie. He denies his holiness; for his conduct declares it to be his persuasion that God can dwell with iniquity. Yea, he puts his power and justice to defiance, by thus rushing against the thick bosses of his bucklers. By denying the perfections of God, he denies his very being; for he, who swears falsely by the true God, materially affirms that there is no God. Therefore, an oath is called a swearing by the life of God, or by his being †; as intimating that he who swears falsely, denies the being of God. When he forbids the awful crime of perjury amongst his ancient people, the argument by which

* Verse 2, 3,

† Jer. v. 2.

which he enforces the prohibition is his very being, as JEHOVAH. Ye shall not swear by my name falsely, neither shalt thou profane the name of thy God: I am JEHOVAH *. The use of this argument, a powerful one indeed, derived from his own incomprehensible essence, denotes that he who swears falsely by his name, denies him to be JEHOVAH, to be the self-existent, independent, and eternal Being.

5. SINNERS discover the atheism of their hearts, by the false apprehensions they entertain of the justice and mercy of God. Alas! we cannot mention the sad prevalence of these delusive notions, without the deepest regret. The mournful experience of almost every day, presents us with affecting instances of their fatal effects. How often do we see men stepping into eternity, big with hopes of salvation; while they rest on a very false foundation? Are there not many, within the circle of our own observation, who are lost in ignorance of the principles of revealed religion; devoted to wickedness, habitual swearers or drunkards, who, notwithstanding, do not entertain the smallest doubt of obtaining eternal happiness? How mournful is it to hear a man on a sick-bed or death-bed, when interrogated as to his hope for eternity, reply, without the least hesitation, "God is merciful, and this "is all my confidence;" and when further asked, "How "his justice is to be satisfied, as he is just as well as merciful;" to find him entirely at a loss for an answer? The frequency of this case, makes it the more deplorable. Have we not found many, on the very brink of eternity, seemingly confident of a happy meeting with God, merely because of the mercy of his nature; while as ignorant of the blood of the Lamb, the only channel in which this mercy can find a vent in the salvation of sinners, as Heathens who never heard of a Saviour. But such wretches do not consider, that a "God all mercy is a God unjust;" that it is inconsistent with his nature to glorify one perfection at the expence of another; that if mercy

be

* Levit. xix. 12.

be manifested towards finners, it can only be through a perfect atonement to Divine justice. Now, whence is it that they have such gross notions about the perfections of God? Whence do they err in matters of such great importance? They are under the reigning power of atheism in their hearts. They cannot find such a God in the Word as would answer their corrupt desires: therefore they create such a God in their own imaginations; a God whose mind is in a state of tumult and uproar, whose perfections are at war with each other! But to frame such an idea of God, is to undeify him, to deny him existence. For he who is God, is possessed of all perfection, which could not be the case, were there any discord among his attributes. Sinners, you cannot make yourselves such as God requires you to be; therefore you presume to make God such a one as yourselves, and imagine that he will approve your sins*. You trifle with his mercy, as if it were a patent for iniquity; and sport with his justice, as if it were a mere bugbear, fit only to frighten children. But were you not heart-atheists, you would tremble at the view of that flaming sword, that shall pierce through the heart of every sinner, who does not embrace the mercy of God, through the propitiatory sacrifice of his dear Son.

6. MEN farther discover the power of this principle by not being influenced in their conduct by an impression of the Divine omnipresence and omniscience. That God is every where present, is a truth very evident from scripture. The Psalmist expresses his sense of this in a very striking manner. Whither shall I go from thy Spirit; or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there: if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea: even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me. If I say, Surely the darkness shall cover me, even the night shall be light about me. Yea the darkness bideth not from thee; but

* Psal. l. 21.

*but the night shineth as the day: the darkness and the light are both alike to thee. It is also a Divine truth, that as he is every where present, he sees all things that take place, and knows, not only the actions of men, but the very thoughts and intents of their hearts. Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in his sight; but all things are naked and opened to the eyes of him with whom we have to do †. Now men are naturally destitute of any proper sense of these attributes; and so demonstrate that they are under the power of atheism. They are evidently without a due sense of his omnipresence and omniscience; for it is their great aim, when committing iniquity, to hide it from the eyes of men; and if they are successful in this, they seem entirely devoid of any other concern. They are nowise affected by a sense of that great truth that impressed the mind of Abraham's Egyptian bond-woman, when she thus addressed God who spake to her; Thou God, see'st me: else they would be as much afraid in secret as before the world; considering the sons of men as worms and grasshoppers in the presence of that God, with whom all the nations are less than nothing, and vanity. There are no gates or bars, no concealments of any kind, that can seclude us from the presence of God, or remove from us his all-seeing eye. Am I a God at hand, saith JEHOVAH, and not a God afar off? Can any hide himself in secret places, that I shall not see him? saith JEHOVAH: Do not I fill heaven and earth? saith JEHOVAH ‡. There is a threefold repetition of his awful, essential name, to declare that omnipresence is essential to his nature, and to convince us of the necessity of a constant sense of it. Our foolish attempts to conceal our actions from men, while we are regardless about their being seen by God, is a certain evidence that we are without a due sense of his being. Therefore is the exhortation given, Be still, and know that I am God; as intimating that those who go on in a course of iniquity, who are like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast cast forth mire and dirt, do not know, acknowledge and believe in God, as God; as he reveals himself in the Word, and as he is in his own perfect essence. For were men duly affected by this truth, that he is God, or truly acquainted with it, they would be still. The impression of it would restrain them from the practice of iniquity.

* Psal. cxxxix. 7.—12. † Heb. iv. 13. ‡ Jer. xxiii. 23, 24.

7. By their disregard of the threatenings of God's law. These are directed against sinners; and so dreadful are they, that at first view one would be apt to imagine, they would make the ears of every one that beareth them to tingle. He threatens to rain snares, fire and brimstone, and an horrible tempest, or, the spirit of storms, the very essence of them, upon the head of the wicked.—He declares that the wicked shall be turned into hell. Men's own consciences, if not greatly feared, must tell them that this is a character applicable to themselves, and that therefore they deserve the punishment threatened. But when the lion roars, they are not afraid. They harden themselves against the curSES written in the book of God. They hear them with as little concern as if they had no reason to apply them to themselves. It is such an obdurate and wicked person as this that Moses describes, as one whose heart turneth away from the Lord,—a root that beareth gall and worm-wood; who, when he beareth the words of the curse, shall bless himself in his heart, saying, I shall have peace, though I walk in the imaginations of my heart, to add drunkenness to thirst. Attend to the dreadful sentence pronounced against this sinner; *The Lord will not spare him, but then the anger of the Lord, and his jealousy shall smoke against that man, and all the curses that are written in this book shall lie upon him, and the Lord shall blot out his name from under heaven. God farther declares his indignation against those who make light of his threatenings: Wo unto them that draw iniquity with cords of vanity;—who say, Let him make speed, and hasten his work, that we may see it ; and let the counsel of the holy One of Israel draw nigh and come, that we may know it*. Now, such persons evidently discover the power of atheism in their hearts ; for as they know themselves to be sinners, they would tremble at the threatenings of the word, were they not lost to a just sense of the being of that God who denounces them.

8. By their rejection of the Gospel. To all unregenerate men the Gospel of Christ is a stumbling-block and foolishness. They, in their carnal wisdom, account the infinite wisdom, displayed in the plan of redemption, folly. They scorn the idea of being indebted to the cross of Christ for salvation. They would rather be saved any way, nay, they would rather run the hazard of damnation, than be saved by the obedience and sufferings of a crucified Redeemer. Now, wherefore does the natural man reject the Gospel and Christ offered in it ? Because he is under the reigning power of atheism. He does not credit the testimony that God gives in his word, that the Gospel is the power of God, and the wisdom of God ; and that in Christ there is eternal life. Thus he calls God a liar. He impeaches his faithfulness ; and by denying him the honour of this attribute, denies his very being. For he is not God, who is not the God of truth.—It is evident that the atheism of the heart prompts men to reject the Gospel. For if they once lose a proper sense of that great truth, the being of God, they also lose a due impression of the certainty of a future state : and if their minds be not deeply impressed with the truth of a coming judgment and state of retribution, they will never find motives so powerful as to incline them to embrace the Gospel, even in a rational manner, and to endeavour obedience to God's commandments. For in the case supposed, they will conclude that it must be the wisest conduct for them, to make themselves as happy as possible in this life, by the indulgence of every sin. Therefore they say unto God, Depart from us.

* Isa. v. 18, 19.

us*. Paul certainly acted as a wise master-builder, when, in his address to a Heathen, he laid the foundation of the faith in Christ, by proving the certainty of a judgment to come †. As he had the greatest reason to apprehend the unbelief of Felix in this matter, not only from the uncertainty of the Heathen doctrine, but from the wickedness and practical atheism of this Heathen's life; he undoubtedly discovered that wisdom given to him, in establishing the principles of the doctrine of Christ,—by declaring the resurrection of the dead, and eternal judgment ‡; knowing that while Felix continued in unbelief or uncertainty about these, he would despise all warnings to flee from the wrath to come. And this will invariably be the case with sinners under a Gospel-dispensation. While they continue Heathens in principle, they can be Christians in name only. While they doubt of a God to punish, they will not embrace a Saviour to redeem.

9. By their contempt of the godly. There are many who not only neglect the duties of religion themselves, but ridicule those who act otherwise. Religious exercises are the subject of their profane mirth; those who fear God are their laughing-stock; and they watch every opportunity of turning the force of their weak and malicious wit against them. But whence proceeds this contemptuous conduct? From their atheism, surely. For if they believed the being of God in a right manner, so far from despising his people, they would reckon them the excellent ones of the earth, and place all their delight in them. But they consider them as despicable, hateful persons; because they forget that there is a God who ruleth in the earth, in whose eyes vile men are despised, but who giveth grace to the humble. This of scorning is, in the Psalm before us, given as one of the characters of the Heart-atheist, and as a fruit and evidence of his atheism, The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God. You have shamed the counsel of the poor, because cause the Lord is his refuge*. “ You have represented “ the conduct of the man who is poor in spirit as a “ foolish and shameful thing, as mean and unmanly ; “ merely because he trusts in God.”

* Job xxi. 14.

† Acts xxiv. 24, 25.

‡ Heb. vi. 1, 2.

THIS subject then informs us what scorners are in God’s account. They are fools. They reckon themselves very wise ; and as if their own despicable prejudices were the standard of truth, they take a liberty in laughing at those who worship the Most High, and make Religion the constant subject of their insignificant raillery. But God reckons them fools, nay, practical atheists. Think with yourselves then, you who make a mock of the righteous, who laugh at prayer, at the worship of God in families, and other exercises of devotion, who call such things mere cant and enthusiasm, duly consider it, whether you will indulge your mirth at the expence of salvation ; whether you will cease to reckon the godly fools, or submit to be reckoned fools by God ; whether you make a wise choice in purchasing a little mirth in time, at the expence of weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth through eternity ? Count the cost. Are you satisfied that your present profits will sufficiently indemnify you for all future loss. For be assured, that if ye indulge your laugh at his people, God will in his turn laugh at you. He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh, the Lord shall have you in derision. And you had better bear the scoffs of all the atheists and ungodly on earth, nay, of all the devils and damned spirits in hell, and their curses too, than the scorn of God. That is an awful word ; Because I have called and ye refused, I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded ; I also will laugh at your calamity, and mock when your fear cometh : when your fear cometh as desolation, and your destruction cometh as a whirlwind : when distress and anguish come upon you.

WE may also learn the necessity of having the heart purified by faith. For a scriptural faith in the being of God, and this alone, is instrumental in

* Verse 6.

in subduing the natural power of atheism. As long as a person remains an unbeliever, his heart continues a sink of impurity; and, as a proof of this, he remains under the power of atheism. But when he cometh unto God, in the exercise of true faith, he is made to believe, in a right manner, that He is.

IN a word, from this subject, we may learn the great importance of having right apprehensions of the nature of God. An error, as to this fundamental article of Religion, is the origin of almost every other that hath crept into it. From ignorance of the Divine nature, arise unjust apprehensions of sin. He who conceives falsely of God, esteems sin to be a small matter. God himself assigns this as the reason: Thou thoughtest that I was altogether such a one as thyself. False notions of punishment must be traced to the same origin. He who reckons sin a light thing, cannot believe that God will punish it in all the extent threatened. From the same source proceed unjust apprehensions of pardon. To him who thinks sin trivial in its nature, it seems easy for God to overlook it. This also produces unjust notions of duty. He who disregards the spiritual nature of God, will deem it enough to offer him carnal services. Thus, errors, with respect to sin, punishment, pardon, or duty, all originate from ignorance of the Divine nature. The sinner thinks falsely of sin, because he hath never seen the glory of that Holiness, in the proclamation of which seraphs cover their faces with their wings. He deceives himself with respect to punishment, because he knows not that God who will by no means clear the guilty. He entertains unjust apprehensions of pardon, from his ignorance of Divine Mercy. And he errs in his notions of duty, because he is a stranger to God the Spirit.

S E R M O N X.

ON THE CONSEQUENCES OF THE NATURAL ATHEISM OF THE HEART.

PSALM xiv. i.

The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God.

HAVING made some general introductory observations on this subject, and considered the evidences of heart-atheism; we now proceed,

III. To illustrate the consequences of it.

THE things we are about to mention are not to be considered as so inseparably connected with this corrupt principle, as always to attend it without any variation. For those who have their hearts delivered from the natural power of atheism, are also delivered from its natural consequences, in their full power: and there are even many who still remain under the dominion of heart-atheism, and yet do not experience all its effects. But we would wish it to be remembered, that the things we have in eye are the natural consequences of atheism; that in itself it has this tendency; and that it would operate in all its dismal consequences on every unrenewed man, were he not restrained by grace. God, as the Creator, Preserver, and Benefactor of mankind, bridles this corruption with respect to its effects, even as to the vessels of wrath, from good will to his creatures. For bad bad as the world is, were atheism suffered to take its full sway in the hearts of men, it would be inexpressibly worse; nay, perhaps we may add, that the wickedness of men would be altogether insufferable. When we speak of the natural atheism of the heart, we do not at all mean a confirmed principle of atheism, in the absolute denial of a God: for then it would be preposterous to speak of its consequences in the manner intended; but only the original principle of corrupt nature, as strengthened by continuance in sin, prompting to this, pregnant with atheistical wishes, and producing an atheistical practice.

THE natural atheism of the heart tends,

I. To apostasy from the true faith. The ground of faith in the doctrines of the holy Scripture, in opposition to those of error, must be the authority and faithfulness of God speaking in his word. A Christian believes these doctrines, which he finds in the Bible, to be true, and the contrary to be false; because God, who cannot lie, hath revealed them. This is the only solid ground of faith; and if a man puts any other in its room, he offers injury to the Most High. If he sets up his own corrupt reason as the standard of truths revealed in the Word, he ceases to believe as a Christian, and gives a faith to Scripture nothing superior to that which he gives to any human testimony or composition. Now, when a professor gives up with this ground, of the Divine authority, on which he formerly seemed, both to himself and others, to stand, he naturally inclines to renounce these very doctrines so established, because of their mysterious nature. He proceeds to bring them to the crooked rule of his depraved reason, to see whether they will tally with it, or rather, whether they will be measured by it. And because he finds them above the comprehension of his reason, he concludes they are contrary to it; and, of course, relinquishes them as unworthy of faith; and in their stead substitutes the doctrines of error. He begins to enquire how and why these things are so and so; and because he cannot give the reason, arrogantly concludes, cludes, that to suppose them to be, as the language of Scripture declares, is to conclude without reason : although, all the while, he has the most decisive proofs which reason can demand, that they are the matter of a Divine Revelation.

Now, whence do men so easily renounce the true ground of faith, and embrace the false foundation of reason ; but from their want of a Scriptural and Divine faith in that God who thus interposes his authority in attesting his own word ? Did they firmly and sincerely believe God to be such as he declares himself to be ; they would find no difficulty in believing his word, barely on his own authority ; they would not startle at founding their faith upon a Thus saith the Lord ; they would not dare to reject Divine truths because mysterious, and above the line of reason ; or to embrace vile and pernicious errors in their room. But if a person has no just and scriptural impressions of the being, majesty, and perfections of God on his mind, it affects him little, whether the doctrines he believes be true or false, if they please his own fancy. Thus he is entirely destitute of a proper antidote against delusion.

FROM these considerations, it appears that the atheism of the heart directly tends to apostasy : and we see how easy it is for one who has not a right faith in the true Religion to embrace a false one. We may suppose the case of a person apostatizing from Protestantism to Popery, and turning back to the polluted embraces of the mother of harlots. This must flow from the atheism of his heart. For if he had a due sense of the being, perfections, and authority of God speaking in his word, he would never leave a pure Divine Religion for an idolatrous one ; he would never prefer the merit of works called good, of fastings, and penances, and prayers of saints, to the righteousness of Christ, for salvation ; and he would be at no loss to apply these characters to the Romish Church, which are given in Scripture to the mother of abominations. Again, suppose a person, educated in the pure

pure doctrines commonly called Calvinistic, to embrace Arminian principles. This apostasy must also originate from the atheism of his heart; for had he a right apprehension of the nature and attributes of God, when he finds the doctrine of particular election clearly declared in God's word, he would never dare to start such an objection as that; "How can it be just with God to choose some and reject others?" and thence to conclude, that he must force another meaning on the language of the Holy Ghost; because this scriptural faith would remind him that the God whom he worships is absolutely sovereign in all his dispensations, and unaccountable to any creature. He would never maintain the doctrine of man's free-will to good in his fallen state: for the belief of this doctrine shows the want of faith in God's free grace. He would not deny the perseverance of the Saints; because this would display ignorance and unbelief of the love and faithfulness of God, which are essential perfections of the Divine nature. He would not presume to assert that Christ died for all men; because this would be an impeachment both of the wisdom and justice of God; for then all men should be saved. Nor would he imagine that the Spirit could be resisted in his efficacious operations; for this is a denial of omnipotence. As little could he apprehend that man's own doings could be the ground of his salvation; for this would discover ignorance of the holiness of God, which demands complete satisfaction to his justice, as well as perfect obedience to his law.

2. To produce an apprehension that there is no truth in Divine Revelation, and, consequently, that all Religion is a human device, a plan wisely designed and politically framed for laying restraints upon vice, and for promoting order, peace and government in civil society. Whence have so many fallen into the dreadful gulph of deism, which consists in denying the reality and necessity of any revealed Religion, and asserting that the light of Nature is sufficient to lead men to eternal happiness; whence is it but from the natural atheism of the heart, acting under less restraint than in most cases? The denial of all Divine Revelation is the natural consequence of this principle of atheism. For if men once lose sight of the true foundation, the whole superstructure of course falls to the ground. Now, the fundamental doctrine of all religion is, that there is a God: but if men lose all just and proper apprehensions of the nature and perfections of this Being, the transition to infidelity is very easy. Indeed, atheism and deism have a reciprocal effect on each other in man's heart. For as natural atheism, if not restrained, hath a direct tendency to produce infidelity: on the other hand, if men are left of God to fall into deism, to deny the truth and divinity of that religion which is revealed by God; it tends greatly to increase the natural atheism of the heart, and to drive them to the horrid extreme of denying all religion whatsoever, whether natural or revealed. The Epicurean Philosophers, of whom we read, Acts xvii. 18. proceeded this length. For they not only rejected revealed religion, of which they gave evidence in esteeming the great Apostle of the Gentiles, when preaching Jesus and the resurrection, a babbler; but they denied all natural religion, and taught that men ought to give full indulgence to their passions, and live according to the dictates of their own minds. For doctrine so strange, they assigned these reasons; that although there was a God, he never troubled himself with the affairs of men, and that he would not call them to an account for their conduct. The natural atheism of the heart, aided by temptation, had this effect upon David, although it was only temporary: I said in my haste, all men are liars *. Here the Psalmist seems to have reflected even on the holy Prophets of God, as if they had only deceived him by their predictions; and thus he tacitly charged God himself with unfaithfulness, by denying the truth of his word.

But

* Psal. cxvi. 11.

But if this was its effect on a child of God, what must it be on the unregenerate, when suffered to exercise its full sway!

3. To give loose reins to all manner of iniquity. Indeed, the unrestrained indulgence of sin, may be viewed either as the cause, or as the consequence of atheism. It cannot be the cause of the natural atheism of the heart; for this must be traced up to the universal corruption of our nature by sin. But it may be justly considered as the cause of great progress in it. Actual sin is a sweet balsam to the original atheism of the heart, which, far from healing, only cherishes and spreads the sore. As the heart naturally wishes that there were no God; as atheism lies at the root of all sin; when sin is greatly indulged, it hardens the conscience, and removes farther and farther from it a sense of the being and perfections of God. The sinner, in the war he carries on against God, may be compared to a soldier, who, in his first action, or perhaps at the commencement of any action, feels a panic seize his heart at the near prospect of death; but this wears off by degrees, till at length he faces danger, without any dread of the consequences. In general, the advances towards speculative atheism, in the denial of Providence, or of a future state, or in uncertainty about both, are made and used by the corrupt heart as a salvo for the indulgence of sin. When a sinner finds that it is greatly his interest that there were no God, he endeavours also to make it his faith, if we may use the expression, about that which unhinges the foundations of all faith, whether in a Divine or human testimony. But as the indulgence of sin greatly increases the natural atheism of the heart, and assists it in making rapid progress towards that which is speculative; heart-atheism, on the other hand, looses the reins to sin, and takes off the remaining restraints lying on conscience. What is it, but this, that makes a man tamper with eternal destruction? The abominable iniquities of the Gentiles are described as the consequences of the indulgence gence of their natural atheism : *Because that when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful, but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened ;—Wherefore God also gave them up to uncleanness.—For this cause God gave them up to vile affections :—And even as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, or rather in acknowledgment, God gave them over to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not convenient ; being filled with all unrighteousness, &c.  The words immediately following our text, may also be viewed as a declaration, both of the proofs, and of the consequences of heart-atheism. The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God. Observe the effect this language, or wish of the heart, hath on his practice. It is the parent of abominable works †, of universal pollution ‡, of gross ignorance, of persecution of the saints, of contempt of Divine worship §, and of profane scorning.

4. To produce unreasonable and ill-grounded fears. One would apprehend, that he, who has in a great measure shaken off the fear of God, would be regardless of every other being. But God, in his righteous judgment, often orders it otherwise, and turns the counsel of those into foolishness, who despise the only proper object of fear ; by making them afraid of what cannot possibly injure them, at least without his permission. He discovers their great weakness, by making them, who have cast off the fear of the Creator, tremble at the creature, and frequently at the creature of their own imaginations only. Thus he threatens those that will not hearken unto him, but walk contrary unto him :—I will send a faintness into their hearts, in the lands of their enemies : and the sound of a shaken leaf shall chase them ; and they shall flee, as fleeing from the sword, and they shall fall when none pursueth ††. And again, A dreadful sound is in his ears : in prosperity the destroyer shall come upon him ‡‡. The wicked flee, when no man pursueth §§. God hath often accomplished accomplished his threatenings on those who have confirmed their natural atheism by atrocious sins. How often have murderers found a punishment in their own breasts, arising from their constant terrors, far more severe than any punishment that man could inflict? Cain made great progress in atheism, and actually went out from the presence of the Lord; whence many conclude, that he renounced the service of the living God, and was the father of Polytheism, by inventing the worship of many false deities. But he went out with a trembling heart: for he was afraid of an enemy in every human creature: It shall come to pass, saith he, *that every one that findeth me shall slay me. This was the case with the atheistical fools, described in the portion of scripture under consideration. For as this Psalm is elsewhere repeated, we find this important enlargement, There were they in great fear, where no fear was †.

* Rom. i. 21. 24. 26. 28. † Verse 1. ‡ Verse 3. § Verse 4.

 Verse 6. †† Lev. xxvi. 21. 36. See also Deut. xxviii. 65, 67.

‡‡ Job xv. 21. §§ Prov. xxviii. 1.

5. To drive to despair. It is the atheism of the heart, taken in one point of view, that makes the sinner imagine there is no mercy for him. It proceeds from the want of a just apprehension of the nature and perfections of God, that the guilty wretch views him as only encompassed by terrors; for he reveals himself in the Word, as a God pardoning iniquity, transgression, and sin; all kinds, and every degree of sin, but that which is in its own nature unpardonable, as being a malicious, spiteful, and obstinate rejection of the very remedy. He exhibits pardon for the most abominable sinner out of hell, through the obedience and sufferings of his own Son Jesus Christ. But when a sinner apprehends there is no mercy for him in God, it manifests that he has no due faith in that revelation which God gives of himself. It gives him the lie, when he says, I, even I, am He that blotteth out thine iniquities, for my name's sake. Thence we find, that many of those who have been eminently given up to the atheism of their hearts, have died in despair. Some professed atheists, indeed, through the dreadful force of their corrup-

tions,

* Gen. iv. 14. 16.

† Pl. liii. 5.

tions, and the powerful aid of the great adversary of souls, have braved it out to the last. But others have been made monuments of Divine justice, even in this life; and those who have tried to disbelieve the being of God, or would have persuaded others they actually did so, or have thought and spoken of God, as if he had been like themselves, and laughed at the idea of hell; have often been left to the most awful terrors of conscience before death, have experienced a hell in their own consciences, and have thus been made terrors to themselves and all around them.

THERE are many instances which confirm the truth of this observation, on record with the Church, in the writings of those men of God, who have diligently attended to the dispensations of his Providence. Many such things have taken place in our own time: But the false tenderness of relations, and the diabolical assiduity of friends in infidelity and companions in wickedness, conceal them from the world; because the former have a greater regard to the glory of the creature, than of the Creator; and the latter are unwilling to let any thing transpire, that may expose themselves to the contempt they deserve, or tend to awaken others to consideration, whom they, like their master, are still seeking to devour. Perhaps, instead of glorifying God, by confessing to the world such striking evidences of his Being and Providence, they deem it a meritorious sacrifice to the memory of their deceased friends, and service to their surviving brethren, to belie the convictions of their own consciences, by trying to persuade the world that they died with a jest in their mouths, with the greatest fortitude, and with the firmest belief in their damnable principles; while the recollection of the horrors themselves have witnessed, is ready to work wrath in their breasts, at the very moment they disavow them. Besides, infidelity has come to such a pitch, and so awfully pervades all ranks of men in the age in which we live, that these things are little attended to, even when discovered. The pretence of a brain-fever, or of the intoxicating power of some medicines, generously administered to banish the sensations of pain, and the thoughts of eternity, is both offered and received, as a satisfactory solution for such disagreeable appearances as are denominated in Scripture the terrors of the Lord. When men have so incorporated atheism with their notions of Revealed Religion, as to deny the sovereignty of his distinguishing mercy, when he plucks brands out of the fire; while many others, no worse than they, are left in it: need we be surprised that a righteous God should suffer them to be so far hardened, as also to deny the sovereignty of his justice, when he as it were casts some into the fire, even in this world, and sets them up as monuments of his indignation; while others, of the same kidney, go down quietly to hell, with a lie in their right hand?
of

6. To hurry men into eternal perdition. The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God. If mercy prevent not, eternal ruin must be the lot of all who are chargeable with this impiety, who forget him in their lives, or wish to forget him in their hearts. It is but just with God, that those, who have obstinately refused to entertain such apprehensions of him as are correspondent to the revelation given in his own precious word, should learn to think more justly by the force of punishment; that those, who, while on earth, have either tried actually to disbelieve his Being, or have fostered such thoughts of him as amount to a denial of it, should be made to believe and tremble in hell: that such as have refused to listen to the thunders of the Law, and also to the still small voice of the Gospel, and to accept of the mercy of God streaming through the blood of Jesus, to learn his nature and will from the book of the law, and to read the demerit of sin in the sufferings of the Redeemer;—should read it by the direful glow of an awakened conscience, and by the light of that fire that shall never be quenched.

THIS subject affords ground of exhortation to those who are delivered from the natural power of atheism,
and

and to such as still remain under it, and perhaps are entirely ignorant of their situation.

WE would exhort you who are freed from the dominion of this corruption, to pray earnestly for deliverance from its remaining power. There is still an atheistical principle in your hearts. Christians, the grace of the Spirit subdues every corruption. But it will totally eradicate none, till it be consummated in glory. As long as you remain in this vale of tears, you must struggle with the plagues of your own hearts. Maintain a constant war with this plague: for it mingles itself with every other, and appears in the heart on every motion of sin. Daily endeavour the mortification of it. There is grace in Christ for this end. Therefore earnestly desire the communication of it. He hath promised, I will give them an heart to know me, that I am JEHOVAH *.

2. STRIVE to resist atheistical thoughts. These sometimes arise from the corruption of your own hearts; sometimes they are darted in by Satan; and often they are excited by his operations on your corruption. But from what quarter soever they proceed, guard against them. Give them not so much as a hearing. The very listening to the suggestions of Satan, or motions of the corrupt heart, is an inward defection, a partial declension to atheism. Therefore, whenever you find any such thoughts arising in your hearts, try to dispel them by the Divine word; Get thee behind me Satan. Immediately hold up the shield of faith. It is this alone that can quench the fiery darts of the wicked one; and it will quench them all. We may add, that the first boss of this buckler is that great truth, "There is a God." Immediately betake yourselves to prayer. The best and surest way to obtain deliverance from temptations to atheism or any other sin, to quench any of Satan's darts, is, by entertaining a deep sense of your own weakness, immediately to fly to God as your refuge, for a supply of strength from him. It was thus the Apostle Paul resisted resisted the messenger of Satan. He befought the Lord. Although the temptation continue after prayer, you must not be discouraged; you must not give up with the duty; but persist in it, till you obtain the answer. You see that Paul did not merely pray, but he befought the Lord thrice: and then he was favoured with a gracious return; My grace is sufficient for thee, my strength is made perfect in thy weakness.

* Jer. xxiv. 7.

3. BEWARE of indulging secret sins. For these are eminent temptations to atheism. Many commit sins by themselves that they would be ashamed to commit before any one in the whole world, however mean and insignificant the person might appear. Now, secrecy is the temptation to the sin; and the regard paid to this temptation is not only an effect of atheism, but an inlet to its further ravages. A person indulging any known sin in secret, which he could not commit before others, is, for the time, an atheist. He does not endure, as seeing him who is invisible. The present language of his heart and conduct is; No eye seeth me: and by the continued indulgence of secret sins, he is in great danger of habitually forgetting that God seeth, and that the most High taketh knowledge. A sense of the danger of these sins prompts the holy Psalmist to present this prayer; Cleanse thou me from secret faults. Ever remember that the Lord sets your secret sins in the light of his countenance.

4. IMPLORE a continued sense of the presence of God on your mind. Remember at all times, in all companies, and in all employments, that the eye of God is fixed on you. Remember this, when you are most in company, or most alone. By a sense of this, and by the due improvement of it, you will have reason to say with that Ancient; "When I am most alone, then I am least alone." For thus you will maintain constant communion with that God who is ever present with you; from whom the darkness hideth not, but the night shineth as the day, as the darkness and the light are both alike unto him. Remember that he not only sees your most secret actions, but your inmost thoughts; that they are all naked and opened unto the eyes of that God with whom you have to do. Endeavour, therefore, through his grace, to retain a constant impression of his command on your spirits; Be still, and know that I am God; I will be exalted.

WE shall conclude, by addressing you who are still under the dominion of heart-atheism.

PERHAPS you may all deny the character. It never belonged to you. For you always believed the being of God. You would reckon him a monster who did not. But if your conduct shall be found on examination to be such as demonstrates that you have no real persuasion of this fundamental truth, then surely, it will be vain for you' to deny the justness of the charge.

Do you live without secret or family prayer? For we do not reckon upon that, in which you join out of compliment to the religion of your country. And will you dare to say, you truly believe the being of a God? If you do so, give the same proof that blinded heathens afford. For they call on their gods. If an inspired Apostle denominates them *atheists in the world, because they do not worship the true God; with how much more propriety may this character be given to those who worship no god at all, who are, in every sense of the expression, without God in the world? All faith, if sincere, according to its kind, whether its object be true or false, will produce worship as its necessary fruit. But you do not adore that God in whom you profess to believe. Therefore, you do not really believe in him. If you still assert that you do, you only give another evidence of the truth of what we say; for God, the Searcher of hearts, adduces it as a proof of atheism, that men seek not after, and call not upon God; and expressly declares of the man who will not seek after God, that God is not in all his thoughts. And by still maintaining that you believe in God, although you do not cal'

* Eph. ii. 12.

call upon him, you make that very God, in whom you profess to believe, a liar. Such is your faith in him. Perhaps some of you worship him, but you do it hypocritically; your hearts habitually denying the language of your lips. But if you believed him to be a God of incomprehensible majesty, you would not dare to offer him so gross an insult.

Do you live in sin, and yet pretend to believe in God? If there be a God, his name must be holy and reverend, never to be used rashly or profanely. But do you customarily take his name in vain? If so, you cannot seriously believe that it is worthy of reverence. And if not, as little do you believe that he is himself worthy of reverence. For, even among men, the respect we have for any person is generally testified by that which we pay to his name. But if you do not believe that God himself is worthy of reverence, you believe not that he is God. Do you live in sin of any kind? Do you delight in it? Is it the source, the essence, the consummation of your bliss? Is it your supreme pleasure? Then surely, you do not truly believe in God. This is a proof that he himself gives of the truth of the doctrine of our text: They are altogether become filthy. No man who is altogether filthy can love infinite Holiness. If a man believe in God, he must believe him to be infinitely good; and, therefore, to be the chief good to his soul. But he who makes sin, the direct contrary of God, his chief good, his exceeding joy, by denying God to be so, virtually denies his being. For he says, that he is unworthy of so much love; thus denies him to be infinitely good; and of consequence, to be God.

Do you disbelieve vindictive Justice? You of course deny infinite Holiness. For justice, in the punishment of sin, is merely the display of holiness in the hatred of it. Now, if you refuse in heart that there is a Being who will punish sin, not merely of the grossest kind, but all sin, where no sufficient atonement is produced, you say in heart, There is no God.

For

For if there be a God, he must be of purer eyes than to behold iniquity. If you live without an habitual sense of Divine omnipresence and omniscience, you virtually deny these perfections. Did you really believe that your earthly sovereign were hearing you, surely you would not venture to utter treason against him. But when you daily utter and practise treason against the Sovereign of heaven and earth, no other reason can be assigned for your conduct, than that you do not believe his presence. But he, who is not believed to be every where present, is not believed to be God.

ARE you not alarmed, though continuing in sin, at the threatenings of God's law? Then it must unavoidably follow, that you do not believe them. This is a conclusion that you would form in any other case, in which you were not yourselves parties. Were it asserted that an army was at the very gates of a city, wasting with fire and sword, and sparing none of any age or sex; you would undoubtedly conclude, with respect to any man who should pay no regard to this intelligence, nor use any means for his safety, either that he was deprived of his reason, or that he did not believe the report. You will not submit to the former conclusion as to yourselves; and it is impossible that you can evade the latter.

DID you see one committing robbery or murder; did you warn him, that if he continued in his wicked course, the sentence of the law of his country would certainly be executed upon him at length; if he still persisted in the commission of his crime, would you not conclude, either that he did not believe that the law would lay hold on him, or that he did not fear death? Apply this to yourselves. If notwithstanding all the threatenings you read and hear, you still go on in sin; are we not under a necessity of concluding either that you do not believe that these threatenings will be accomplished, or that you care not although they should? If the former be the case, you disbelieve
the

the being of God ; for you deny his justice and faithfulness : if the latter, matters are just as bad ; for you pretend to believe in a God whom you do not fear. But these things are irreconcilable. For God himself saith : If I am a father, where is mine honour ? and if I am a master, where is my fear ?

Do you reject the blood of Christ as offered to you in the Gospel ? The first consequence is, that you disbelieve the Bible. For it assures you that you must be miserable, if you do. But this is not all. You also in your hearts join in the creed of fools, recorded in our text. For even your own consciences at times condemn you for sin. When, therefore, you despise to spend one thought about a remedy offered to you as of infinite value and efficacy, you say in fact that there is no God to punish sin, that is, as we have already seen, that there is no God.

IN a word, do you laugh at those who fear God ? Did you believe that psalm, in which our text lies, to be of Divine inspiration, you would acknowledge this to be an evidence of atheism. But by continuing to sit in the chair of the scorner, you show that you disbelieve Divine Revelation, you really laugh at all religion ; because you ridicule those who observe that worship which is instituted in the Word. And as you not only pour contempt on this, but on every thing that looks like the fear of God ; as you propose no substitute for this instituted worship ; as while despising this, you observe no other ; you in fact laugh at God himself, and say that it is not worth your while to seek him, or call upon him in any way.

ARE these things so ? Then, God will never reckon you serious in believing his being. Nor will any of his creatures, capable of impartial judgment, do so ; whether Angel, Saint or Devil. Having thus, we hope, proved the justness of the charge, or shown to whom the description contained in our text belongs ; we earnestly call you,

I. To consider that there is a God, and that he takes notice of all your actions. To illustrate the folly of the sinner's apprehension, That there is no Providence, that God nowise interests himself in the affairs of men, the Spirit here declares, that the Lord looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any that did understand, and seek God. This is a form of speaking after the manner of men; for the eye of Omniscience does not, like that of man, need to travel over objects distinctly and separately, in order to have a just notion of them. God sees all things by one intuitive glance. For this reason it is said, that all things are naked and opened unto his eyes. The most secret things are so obvious to him, that they are as it were spread out before him. The Lord looketh from heaven, he beholds all the sons of men; from the place of his habitation he looketh upon all the inhabitants of the earth. Unbelieving, atheistical Sinner, if thou continuest in this state, it were well for thee that thy wish were realized, that there were no God. But know, poor worm, that thy rebellious desires can never deprive the eternal and omnipotent God of being; nor shall they deprive thee of the hated immortality of thy own existence, when the thread of natural life is cut in funder. Thy wishes for annihilation shall never reduce thee to nothing. But if thou remainest under the power of atheism, thou shalt be set up as a monument of the justice of God to all eternity. Although thou shouldest never be delivered from the power of atheism on earth, the torments of hell shall deliver thee from this. There shall not be one Atheist there. The tremendous nature of the sufferings, and the astonishing power of God in supporting a finite being under them, shall fully convince thee of his existence, and that he is a God who will by no means clear the guilty. Consider, unawakened sinner, that there is a coming judgment, and that the inconceivable terrors of that day shall display the madness
of

of thy atheism. Then shall that God, of whom thou hast no fear now, if mercy prevent not, appear to thee clothed in terrors, the very appearance of which shall be ready to dissolve thy existence. Then shall guilty finners cry to the rocks and mountains, Fall on us and cover us from the wrath of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb.—Then the sinners in Zion shall be afraid, and cry out, Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? Who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings? Know that, in that awful day, God shall open the book of his remembrance, and all thy sinful thoughts, and words, and deeds, shall be disclosed before assembled worlds. Then those impious thoughts and actions, by which thou hast, either in heart or conduct, virtually denied the being of a God, shall fill thee with horror and confusion.

2. ENDEAVOUR to attain a firm and proper persuasion of this great truth, That there is a God. Seek to have it engraved on your hearts, as with an iron pen and lead in the rock for ever. Contemplate God in his works, and especially in his word. Search the Scriptures, for in them you have eternal life, whether you think so or not. There are more striking evidences of the being of God to be found in his word, when accompanied by the Spirit, than in all his works. The holy Scripture contains innumerable internal proofs, that it is a book infinitely superior to any human or created understanding. Pray for the power of the Spirit to attend the reading and hearing of his word. Diligently attend on the means of grace, and pay the strictest regard to the holy Sabbath. Sabbath-breaking is generally an introduction to every heinous sin, and greatly increases the atheism of the heart. For when men lose a sense of the holiness of God's day, they soon lose a sense of God himself. Avoid the company of those who are mockers of Religion. It is dangerous to associate with such. If they make no farther impression,

sion, they may at least make you ashamed of the slight profession of religion you still retain. Say of them as Jacob of his cruel sons ; O my soul, come not thou into their secret: unto their assembly, mine honour, be not thou united.

3. APPLY to God for the destruction of all sin, and particularly of the sin of atheism. Come to him that he may remove all that power of unbelief, which is in your heart. Try the language of him in the Gospel ; Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief.

4. IN the strength of promised grace embrace him as your God and Father in Christ. He is, in the Word, offering himself to you in this amiable character. The sons of the stranger that join themselves to the Lord—they will I bring to my holy mountain. I am found of them that sought me not.—I am your God. Now, it is only a believing apprehension of him in this character that can deliver you from the power of atheism. But if brought, by the influences of the Spirit, to receive him as a God of love, as your Father ; you will not only believe aright that there is a God, but find to your comfortable experience that he is the rewarder of all them that diligently seek him.

S E R M O N XI.

ON THE DECEITFULNESS OF THE HEART.

JEREMIAH xvii. 9.

The heart is deceitful above all things:—

ALL Gospel-preaching, with regard to any certain effect on those who hear it, is, to the servants of Christ, like drawing a bow at a venture. It is the Holy Spirit alone, who can so direct the Word as to smite the sinner between the joints of the harness *, and make it a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart. But there are some subjects that have a more native tendency, as means to accomplish this desirable end, than others which have equally the sanction of inspiration. Among those, we consider a view of the evils of the depraved heart as demanding a principal place. There is, indeed, a method of treating of the heart, which is now, alas! too generally adopted, that can be as little conducive to the recovery of diseased souls, as the assistance of a physician would be to one in imminent danger, who should lay it down as his first principle, by which all his future conduct was to be regulated, that his patient was in perfect health. To discourse to a sinner of the noble dispositions of soul that he once possessed, and of the perfection of heart that originally belonged to him, as if he still retained them in their primitive state; is only to ridicule his misery and make him despise the remedy. Such sermons might have done well enough for man in a state of innocence. To him they would have been lessons of gratitude, and also of duty. But to address fallen man in this manner, is only to pursue a laborious method of increasing the depravity of his nature, and of leading him farther astray from God. Christ, the great Prophet of the Church, and the great Pattern

VOL. I.

C c

* 1 Kings, xxii. 34.

tern of all Gospel-ministers, as he hath set us an example of preaching to the heart, hath also pointed out the manner of treating this subject. Instead of flattering his hearers with delusive descriptions of their own excellencies; their inward wickedness was a topic on which he greatly insisted. One evil that he often illustrated to his hearers was the deceitfulness of their hearts. This was the substance of all the accusations which he exhibited against the Pharisees. Therefore does he so frequently upbraid them as hypocrites. If some are offended at this way of preaching, they declare themselves to be of the same Spirit with that perverse generation, which rejected the great Apostle of our profession. All the Prophets who appeared before him preached in the same style. Thus did Jeremiah address the professed people of God in his time; The heart is deceitful above all things.

IN the preceding part of this chapter, we have a declaration of the iniquity of the children of Judah, and of those judgments that the Lord was about to inflict as the punishment thereof. In verse 5. he denounces a curse against the man that trusteth in man; that trusteth in him either for temporal or spiritual salvation; that trusteth either in another, or in himself, in any respect. The 6th verse expresses both the essence, and the evidence of the curse. For, as a demonstration of the vanity of his confidence, he shall be like the heath in the desert, and shall not know when good cometh. He shall be desolate and unfruitful, like the bleak and barren heath in the wilderness, that knows no distinction of seasons, that is as unprolific in summer as in winter. This allusion will appear to be remarkably beautiful and expressive, if it be remembered that the heath, as it never bears fruit, does not even begin to blossom till about harvest, when almost every other plant is on the decline. The genial influence of the sun, the cooling breezes and refreshing dews of summer, are all lost on it. Like this barren production of the desert, is the self-righteous sinner. He is on every hand surrounded by fruitful trees. In common with them, he receives the waterings of a Gospel-ministry. The beams of the Sun of Righteousness shine around him. In the convincing and comforting influences of the Spirit, the north and south winds awake and blow upon fellow professors, and even the first of these on his own conscience. In a word, the dews of heaven fall on every side: but like Gideon's, his fleece is altogether dry; his heart remains obdurate, and his life is unfruitful; because his root is rottenness, he trusteth in himself, he maketh flesh his arm, and thus his heart departeth from the Lord. As a counterpart to the curse denounced against carnal confidence, there is, in verse 7. a blessing pronounced on the man that trusteth in the Lord. And the evidence of his blessedness is declared in the following verse. For he shall be as a tree planted by the water, and that spreadeth out her roots by the river, and shall not see when heat cometh; but her leaf shall be green, and shall not be careful in the year of drought: neither shall cease from yielding fruit. The Lord proceeds to demonstrate, in the words of our text, the danger of trusting in man, and the justness of the curse denounced against this false confidence, and of the awful judgment incurred; by declaring, in the most striking terms, the deceitfulness of the human heart. This may be also introduced, as the source of that strong propensity which is in man, to carnal confidence of every kind. Since both Scripture and experience verify the folly of this conduct; what can be the origin of that irresistible inclination which every man discovers to trust in himself, or in an arm equally feeble? It undoubtedly proceeds from the natural deceitfulness of his heart.
is

THE word here rendered deceitful, in its simple and original sense, signifies any thing that is crooked; as, a crooked way. In this sense, it is opposed to one that is straight, Isa. xl. 4. The crooked places shall be made straight. Hence it is metaphorically applied to the heart of man, to denote its perverseness, wickedness
and

and deceitfulness. Being derived from a word which signifies to supplant, it is with the greatest propriety transferred to the heart; because, by its deceit, it does every thing in its power to supplant God of his glory, and even itself of eternal happiness. The idea of supplanting may in some sense be applied to a crooked way, because it misleads the traveller by its windings and defiles, and supplants him of the design of his journey: but far more strictly does it correspond to the heart, because it has so many windings and wanderings of deceit; is, in a spiritual sense, crooked, as on every side declining from the straight path of righteousness, from the unerring standard of the Divine law; and has no truth in it. Others think that the idea is taken from a road, that has many footsteps in it, when covered with slime and mud: as if the heart were said to be full of pits and depths, to express the greatness and variety of its deceitfulness.

ALTHOUGH it were possible for us, to say all on this important subject that man can say, there would still be reason to confess, that the one half had not been told. For the deceitfulness of the heart is unfathomable. The concluding words of the verse put the understanding of every creature to defiance: Who can know it? But, however insufficient at any rate, for investigating this subject; we apprehend that it would be highly injurious both to it, and to you, to pass it over altogether in a cursory manner.

It is proposed, first, to adduce some general evidences of the deceitfulness of the heart: Then to consider it more particularly, with respect to sin; its methods of stifling convictions, and of abusing them, in subserviency to false grounds of confidence; with respect to the duties of religion; the conduct of life; and Providential dispensations: Then to inquire why the heart is declared to be deceitful above all things: And, finally, to take notice of some things, which, although themselves deceitful, the heart of man surpasses in deceit.

BUT all that we propose from this text, at present, is to mention some general evidences of the working of this corruption.

I. MAN discovers this corrupt principle, by adopting or maintaining a profession of religion hypocritically. Many, it may be feared, in the Church of Christ, embrace a profession, when they are themselves convinced, that their hearts are not right with God, nor sound in his statutes. It is impossible that there can be, on earth, any society of considerable extent, without bad men in it. The Church, although a society instituted by God himself, regulated by the most perfect laws, and guarded by the most tremendous penalties, is nevertheless not exempted from the intrusion of the wicked. Into the heavenly Jerusalem alone can no unclean thing enter. In the Church visible there still have been, and there ever will be tares among the wheat. The Lord of the harvest suffers it to be so, for the display of his adorable perfections, especially of his love, wisdom, and power, in gathering in his elect, even by unlikely means; and of his justice, in the final condemnation of hypocrites, who shall thus appear inexcusable. Nor, from his infinite compassion to the weakest disciple, will he suffer his servants to claim a right of judging with certainty of the state of professors, and of acting accordingly; lest, in attempting to gather up the tares, they root up also the wheat with them. This mingled state of the Church he likewise permits, for the sake of his people, that they may retain a godly jealousy over their own deceitful hearts; that they may see the danger of trusting, in any degree, to religious duties; and earnestly seek the assurance of a more solid ground of consolation. God in sovereignty also suffers this, as a stumbling-block to the wicked, who, upon a discovery of hypocrites in the Church, harshly extend this character to all its members, and boldly pronounce every religious profession to be false: because they are resolved not to believe his word, and the reality of religion, on his own testimony.

Those who are conscious of hypocrisy, may adopt and maintain a religious profession, merely in some degree to pacify conscience. When this is alarmed by a sense of sin, they are said to lull it, if possible, by the semblance of holiness. However preposterous the attempt may seem, the conscience, while in a state of defilement, easily complies with deceit, being itself under the power of deceitfulness. Others may assume a cloak of religion, that in this way they may display their natural abilities, and gain the affection or admiration of the religious. Or they may design the advancement of their temporal interests. When the Church enjoys external prosperity, hypocrites abound most; as then the appearance of godliness may be subservient to gain. Jeremiah gives a short, but striking character of such professors, when complaining of them to God; Thou art near in their mouth, and far from their reins *. They use religion just as it serves their own purposes. Yet they will have the presumption to pretend, nay, to boast, that they are doing God service, and seeking his glory; while only accomplishing their own impious designs, and perhaps transgressing the very letter of his law. Concerning them, Isaiah speaks to the righteous in his time, whom they persecuted; Hear the word of the Lord, ye that tremble at his word; Your brethren that hated you, that cast you out for my name's sake, said, Let the Lord be glorified †. Of this character was Jehu. He could say to Jonadab, Come and see my zeal for Jehovah, while he meant only to accomplish the purposes of his own ambition. But the Lord used him as his instrument in punishing the wicked house of Ahab, and the accursed priests of Baal. After all his pretences, it is declared, That he took no heed to walk in the law of the Lord God of Israel with all his heart; for he departed not from the sins of Jeroboam, who made Israel to sin ‡. Hypocrisy was a prevailing iniquity among God's ancient people. Of this he often complains; and, would to God! that his language were not too applicable to us: Yet, they seek me daily, and delight to know my ways, as a nation that did righteousness, and forsook not the ordinance of their God: they ask of me the ordinances of justice; they take delight in approaching unto

* Jer. xii. 2. † Isa. lxvi. 5. ‡ 2 Kings x. 16. 31.

unto God*. How opposite is this base character to that of the children of God, who, according to the measure of grace given them, are like the men of Zabalun, who were not of double heart †. Some throw aside the cloak of a profession, as being too cumbersome, as soon as their purposes are served by it; or perhaps, when they find themselves disappointed in their expectations. Others continue to wear it to the end, and will never be discovered, till the Son of man shall send his angels to separate the precious from the vile.

2. THE deceitfulness of the heart appears, when men discover greater zeal about matters of indifference, or, at least, of comparatively less importance, than about those of the greatest moment. This is exhibited by our Lord as an evidence of the hypocrisy of the Pharisees: Wo unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites, for ye pay tithe of mint, and anise, and cummin; and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith. These ought ye to have done, and not leave the other undone. Ye blind guides, who strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel ‡. They preferred the observation of the ceremonial law to that of the moral; and indeed, were more anxious about obedience to the least precept of the one, than to the greatest of the other. Those things that are of greater moment, and these which are of less, are both to be observed as duties; but still in their own place. These of less importance are not to be preferred to those of the greatest; nor is the observation of the one to be considered as an apology to God for the wilful neglect of the other. Christ calls the Pharisees blind guides, because they strained at a gnat, &c. This alludes to the custom observed by the Jews of straining their liquors before they drank; lest they should swallow any thing, however small, that was unclean, or that might prove prejudicial. He accuses them of swallowing a camel, while they strained at a gnat. They made great ado about the least observances in religion, and even about such as were not of Divine institution, but had only the sanction of their beloved traditions; while they could easily put up with the omission of the clearest and most important duties, such as immediately concerned the glory of God, or the good of their neighbour. They omitted judgment. They were negligent of the execution of justice between man and man. They omitted mercy. Instead of relieving the distressed, they devoured the houses of widows. They omitted faith. All their religion was destitute of the leading principle of faith in God; or, as the word may be understood, they had no sense of faithfulness or honesty in civil transactions. It is greatly to be lamented, that this Pharisaical spirit prevails with many professors of the Christian religion; and much to be feared that it prevails with many who make a greater profession than others. Many in our time seem exceedingly zealous about the external duties of religion, who are destitute of any regard for the internal and more substantial parts of it. They are perhaps regular in the observation of secret, private, and public ordinances, but in a great measure negligent of relative duties. They are undutiful husbands or wives, parents or children, masters or servants. You can have little dependance on their word, or confidence in their uprightness in civil dealings. Perhaps they carry on a practice of deceit, extortion, and oppression in so secret a manner, that although suspected by all around, no one can prove it. They are indeed commendable in their attention to instituted duties. But is this to be put in the room of every thing else? Persons of this description seem to view the first table as comprehending the whole law, and the bare outward observation of it as including the whole of religion.
be-

* Isa. lviii. 2. † 1 Chron. xii. 33. ‡ Matt. xxiii. 23, 24.

THERE are others who go still farther. They place the greatest part of their religion in scrupulosity about matters of mere indifference. Those things, for which they have no authority from the word of God, they wish to impose on others, as of indispensable obligation. The smallest deviation from a common form, which has no other sanction than that of custom, and it may be, not even that of common sense, will be esteemed a grievous defection. The most innocent and necessary recreations will be reckoned unlawful freedoms. The very shape of a garment, or the dress of another, although consistent with the station in life, and with the rules of decency, will enter into their consciences; as if there were a certain sanctity in a custom, because it is a hundred years old; or, as if there never had been a change in these trifles, before the present age. We are far from defending that despicable and sinful vanity, which is so very prevalent in our times, of eagerly hunting after every new fashion, and of spending a great deal of time and money on gaudy attire. This conduct discovers an empty mind. It is to glory in what originates from our shame. But may not the pride of the heart as really appear, in an unseasonable zeal for the indifferent customs of the former age, as in an excessive conformity to those of the present? May not the affectation of an extreme peculiarity be as real a sacrifice to vanity as its contrary? Yes. For the Pharisees made broad their phylacteries, and enlarged the borders of their garments; and this they did to be seen of men. It is no new thing for men to wear a rough garment to deceive.—To some the mere pronounciation of a word, however intelligible, or tone of the voice, will prove a weighty stumbling-block; as if a man should be accounted an offender, not only for a word, but for the very sound of it.
not

NOTWITHSTANDING all this warmth of zeal, you may perhaps find some of this character, if carefully watched, almost strangers to a principle of common integrity. They will make conscience a plea for all their impositions on others. But they more generally arise from the deceitfulness of the heart, than from any tenderness of conscience. Some of the children of God may, indeed, be very weak; and it would be sin to offend them. But, at the same time, it is the duty of ministers to show them what is religion, and what is mere whim or superstition. And it is their own duty to endeavour to get their consciences regulated according to God's Word; lest they be found chargeable with the guilt of will-worship, and of offending God by offering him vain oblations. Where such aptness to take offence is found, even with those who seem to be real Christians, if carefully investigated, it will appear to arise more from want of knowledge, than from tenderness of conscience: and, perhaps, the wilful indulgence of this ignorance, contrary to the clear light of the Word, which, in the most evident manner, distinguishes between sin and duty, may be a greater sin in them, than any supposed offence in matters of indifference, that can be given them by others. This temper is far more prejudicial to the interests of religion than is generally imagined. For, when professors give a false importance to matters of indifference, especially if they be more strict about these, or about things comparatively of less weight, than about the most essential; when men seem to make religion consist in absolute trifles, or are far more zealous about mint, and anise, and cummin, than about the weightier matters of the law; it induces others, who are unacquainted with its power, to apprehend that there is no reality in it at all. It is also extremely hurtful to the interests of religion in the persons themselves who indulge this spirit. For it insensibly confirms them in a Pharisaical temper; inspires them with a capricious and censorious disposition toward others; and, although real Christians, leads them to pay more attention to the externals of religion, than to a life of communion with God. This propensity is a great evidence of the deceitfulness of the heart. For in this manner, many, as it were, compound with their consciences; and enter into an engagement with them, that if they will not reprove them for the omission of the weightier matters of the law, they will be very rigid in the observation of things of less importance, and even lay a considerable weight upon matters of indifference. This, to those who have not the reality of religion, appears.

appears an easy way of purchasing a religious character; and the consciences of such, having never been purified by the Spirit, are very easily satisfied, and will give them peace at a small expence. But if any appear habitually more concerned about the outside of religion, than about the very soul and essence of it; they give the greatest reason for suspecting them of hypocrisy. For hypocrites are always partial in their religion. The study of universal obedience to God's commandments is too severe a task. They are therefore pleased with a part: and they choose that part which is least essential, because it answers two of their deceitful ends; it gives themselves less trouble, and it makes a greater blaze in the eye of the world.

WE would not here be thought to teach indifference with respect to those things in religion, that are comparatively of less importance. Very far from it. All the Lord's people, according to their light and grace, will be concerned to observe all things, whatsoever he hath commanded them; to buy the truth, however expensive the purchase, and to sell it at no price: because every Divine truth, every Divine institution, is of infinite importance; is a part of that testimony which the faithful and true Witness hath sealed with his inestimable blood; and necessarily belongs to that testament which the great Testator hath died to confirm, and hath risen again and revived to execute. But we would expose the folly of those who discover great zeal and fervour about the less important matters of the law, and are shamefully negligent of those of the greatest moment. We would also illustrate the danger of ingrafting those things into religion, which are entirely indifferent; because this has a tendency to lead away from the true foundation, and favours of an attempt to add to the things which are written in the book of God. Did not the innumerable absurdities of the Roman Church spring from this very source? Carnal or superstitious men, displeas'd with the spirituality of God's law, tried to atone

atone for their neglect of the weightier matters of it by substituting in their room an endless variety of trivial observances, that were entirely destitute of the impress of Divine authority. These gradually swelled into a system, far more burdensome than that law of ceremonies which the Son of God abolished in his death, and as ridiculous as the human mind, in its most debased state, can be supposed capable of devising. An unscriptural scrupulosity often arises, even in real Christians, from a decline of that zeal, which hath once animated them in regard to practical religion. They feel the want of their former zeal, and must supply it some way or other. But instead of really awakening it in their hearts, and giving it a proper direction to its former objects; they deceive themselves with a mere phantom, which indeed assumes the appearance of zeal, and the place once occupied by zeal of a genuine kind. But it is merely the counterfeit of the other; it has not the same gracious origin; and it entirely differs from it in the mode of operation, being principally employed about matters of indifference. This spirit may also spring from peevishness of temper, from envy, or from ambition. A bad natural temper, in order to cover its own moroseness or virulence, may assume the mask of unwarrantable rigidity or censoriousness in religion. An envious person, who is sensible of the superiority of fellow-professors, may wish to bring them more on a level; and, at least in secret, to triumph over them, by subjecting them to his caprice. One, whose ambition is checked by means of station, may attempt to purchase distinction by the appearance of uncommon zeal.

BUT what will it avail you, professor, although you have every matter of indifference submitted to your pleasure, although you had every form of religion regulated to your mind, nay, every precious truth preserved entire: what will it avail you, though you be strict in a professed adherence to these, and unblameable in all the externals of religion? If this be all, you are but a sounding brass, and a tinkling cymbal.

cymbal. You may, indeed, continue in the valley of vision, and form the complete skeleton of a Christian. But like those ancient professors, you want sinews, and flesh, and skin; and what is worst of all, you want breath*. You are yet a dead man. You want the life, the soul of religion. Notwithstanding all your form, and your zeal about it, you deny the power of godliness.

3. THE short continuance of religious impressions, whether on saints or sinners, is another evidence of this deceitfulness. Unrenewed men, when they have heard an awakening sermon, when they have been visited with some severe affliction, or when any arrow of conviction hath been fixed in their hearts by the power of the Spirit, are ready to apprehend that they shall be entirely different persons ever after. They set about external reformation, and, it may be, endeavour to cleanse their hearts and mortify their lusts by prayer and fasting: but, the first temptation that assails them effaces all these serious impressions, and plunges them into those sins that they pretended to forsake. Now, as the leading reason of this is, that they have not undergone a saving change in regeneration; it argues the great deceitfulness of their hearts, that all their zeal for God and religion, for the purification of their hearts and reformation of their lives, is dissipated by the first blast of temptation. Even Simon Magus had a kind of faith. It is said, that he believed and wondered; and perhaps he thought himself as good a Christian as any around him. But when he encountered a temptation to his ambition and covetousness, he instantly discovered that he was yet in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity. In a short time he became one of the greatest enemies of the Christian Religion; and as is generally believed, was the founder of the impious sect of the Gnostics, who, pretending to believe Christianity, shockingly corrupted it, and intermixed it with heathen abominations. The deceitfulness that also prevails in the hearts of the Lord's people, appears by the short duration of their religious religious impressions. Often, after enjoying the most comfortable communion with God, and resolving to walk always with him, they find that the duty in which they have been engaged is scarcely ended, ere their warmth of affections and holy resolutions are vanished. Christians have frequent occasion to observe that their hearts are never more ready to be trivial, or to be carried away by vanity, than immediately after they have made the most solemn approaches to God. This may, in some measure, proceed from the temperament of our minds in this embodied state. They cannot bear to be always on the stretch. Therefore, when the faculties have been most excited for any length of time, they are in a manner exhausted, and require relaxation. But it especially proceeds from the deceitfulness of the heart, which always endeavours to escape from under the yoke of religious exercises. Even while the understanding disclaims the idea of any reliance on the work performed, as if it were in any degree meritorious, the legality of the heart may, in a secret and almost imperceptible manner, discover its power by blunting the pleasant edge that was on the spirits, as if it were now less necessary than before the performance of the duty. This shows the great necessity of that exhortation given by Christ to his disciples, immediately after the first celebration of the Sacrament of the Supper: Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation. To express the danger of slightly parting with gracious impressions, and the great prevalence of this evil with his own people, the Lord condescends to speak after the manner of men, as if his omniscience were put to a stand by it, as if the only wise God were himself at a loss for a remedy: *O! Ephraim, what shall I do unto thee? O! Judah, what shall I do unto thee? For your goodness is as the morning cloud, and as the early dew it goeth away. No metaphor in nature can more justly express the transient nature of religious impressions, even on the hearts of the saints. How soon is the morning cloud dispelled, and the early dew drunk up by

* Ezek. xxxvii.

* Hof. vi. 4.

by the scorching rays of the sun in a warm country, which generally enjoys an unclouded sky ! As soon do the scorching flames of lust in the heart, especially when set on fire of hell, or fanned by the world's temptations, drink up, or, if we may so express it, evaporate our most serious impressions, unless we be watered every moment by that dew of the Holy Ghost, that waiteth not for man, nor tarrieth for the sons of men.

4. THIS deceitfulness appears by the many delusions of the imagination, in forming great hopes of earthly riches, honour or pleasure. Any person, who is but in a small degree, and in a natural way, acquainted with the workings of his own heart, must know how often it is hurried away, amused, and deluded by the most vain and foolish imaginations. How often does the poor man build himself up, and regale his fancy with the empty prospect of great riches. Even while awake, he pleasantly indulges the golden dream. He imagines to himself, how his eyes shall be dazzled with the lustre of his heaps of gold and silver. Does he try to satisfy the present cravings of nature, by feigning to himself the most luxurious feasts ? It is even as when a hungry man dreameth, and behold he eateth ; but he awaketh, and his soul is empty : or, as when a thirsty man dreameth, and behold he drinketh ; but he awaketh, and behold he is faint, and his soul hath appetite *. Perhaps, he forms plans of his future operations, projects what he shall then do, what he shall say, how he shall demean himself to his former companions, and in what manner he shall spend his future wealth. How often does the mean man amuse his imagination with the delusive hope, we can scarcely call it hope, for it hath not probability sufficient to constitute hope ; with the idea, with the supposition of honour and dignity, to which it is possible he may yet be advanced. He runs over, in his mind, the swelling titles and honourable names by which he may yet be known ; fondly indulges his fancy in dwelling on them, even while his judgment declares his folly ; and perhaps, enjoys more pleasure in his delusion, lusion, than he could enjoy in the reality. A man, in indulging his vain imaginations, often imposes upon himself so far as to try to persuade himself of the probability of that in his own case, which has no more probability with regard to him than to a million of others around him. If one of his acquaintance has been unexpectedly exalted in his situation in life, he will consider this as a strong argument for the probability of his own advancement. And is not this vanity of imagination, which all must feel in some degree, because of the natural folly of all, a decisive proof of the deceitfulness of the heart? Such it is esteemed by God: Ephraim feedeth on wind, and followeth after the east wind. How is the truth of this illustrated? Ephraim said; Yet I am become rich, I have found me out substance *. From partiality to ourselves, we may apologise for such reveries of fancy, as if they were altogether harmless, however ill-founded. But, as they demonstrate the vanity of the mind †; the Searcher of hearts not only declares them to be vain, but wicked: O! Jerusalem, wash thine heart from wickedness, that thou mayest be saved; how long shall thy vain thoughts lodge within thee ‡.

* Isa. xxix. 8.

5. THE extreme reluctance of the heart to believe its own deceitfulness, is a great evidence of its power. Notwithstanding the many express declarations of this contained in the word of God, and the various proofs that every man gives of it; the heart naturally refuses the charge, gives the lie to God, and flatly denies the evidence of demonstration. Now, as we conclude that he is certainly blind, who asserts that he is in darkness, and can discern no object, even while the sun shines on him at mid-day; when a man denies the deceitfulness of his heart, in opposition to the most convincing proofs from scripture, and from his own experience of its fruits; we with equal propriety conclude, that this very denial is a corroborating proof of the justness of the charge. The truth is; as a man born blind cannot see the light, or discern objects around him, unless his eyes be opened: as little can
the

* Hof. xii. 1. 8.

† Eph. iv. 17.

‡ Jer. iv. 14.

the heart be persuaded of its own deceitfulness, till the eyes of the understanding be opened, by the Spirit of wisdom and revelation. This blindness of mind is like the jaundiced eye, which makes a man apprehend that every thing he views is discoloured, while the whole error lies in his own diseased organ. Although a person deprived of the exercise of reason, may sometimes imagine that all around him are mad, and that he alone is in his senses; we would not sustain this as any evidence of the soundness of his judgment, but on the contrary, as an evidence of his insanity; especially when this is confirmed by the rest of his conduct. Our Lord, addressing the Pharisees, considers their denial of the charge of spiritual blindness as a certain document of its reality: If ye were blind, ye should have no sin, i. e. "if ye were destitute of revelation, if I had not come and spoken unto you, your sin would be unspeakably less; or, if ye were sensible of your own blindness, it would be an evidence of your deliverance from its dominion:" but now ye say, we see; therefore your sin remaineth; "you are filled with apprehensions of the greatness of your wisdom, and of the perfection of your righteousness; and this infallibly demonstrates that you are yet under the absolute power of sin*." Solomon seems to adopt the same proof: The wisdom of the prudent is to understand his way; but the folly of fools is deceit †. Elsewhere he speaks more clearly on this head. The way of the wicked is as darkness: they know not at what they stumble ‡. They cannot refuse that they do stumble; but like a man walking in such gross darkness, that he cannot discern objects around him, they know not the true cause, and deny it when declared to them. So great is this reluctance, that sinners, instead of crediting what they hear from the law and testimony, are apt to take offence at the servants of Christ, when they insist on the evils of the heart; as if they had a pleasure in magnifying the wickedness of man, and in representing human nature as vastly worse than it really is. At any rate, they deny the applicableness of the doctrine to themselves, and proudly say, with the vain-glorious Pharisees, Are we blind also * ?

* John ix. 41.

† Prov. xiv. 8.

‡ Prov. iv. 19.

FROM the foregoing observations we may learn,

1. THE origin of hypocrisy in a religious profession. Of this the natural deceitfulness of the heart is the parent. This is the cause of the dreadful presumption of sinners in resting on a name to live. Hypocrisy, indeed, whatever form it assumes, is just the acting of this corrupt principle which lies hid in the heart.

2. THE only cure of hypocrisy. This is the destruction of the principle of deceit. One may with considerable ardour aim at sincerity in a profession; but he is still, in God's account, an hypocrite, as long as his inward deceitfulness remains in full power. It is only by the removal of the cause, that the effect can cease.

3. THE danger of this course. You, who are sensible that you are false and hypocritical in your profession, that you only seek your own interest, or the praise of men, should consider the awful judgments, which God denounces against you. The congregation of hypocrites shall be desolate. The hypocrites in heart heap up wrath; they cry not when God bindeth them. They die in youth, and their life is among the unclean. The Lord shall have no joy in their young men; neither shall have mercy on their fatherless and widows: for every one is an hypocrite and an evil-doer. God summons all with the greatest solemnity, to attend to his judgments on hypocrites: Hear ye that are far off, and ye that are near, acknowledge my might. The sinners in Zion are afraid, fearfulness hath surprised the hypocrites. He summons all to attend to their language under his judgments; who among us shall dwell with devouring fire? who amongst us shall dwell with everlasting burnings? It is only by being delivered from from the hypocrisy of your hearts, that you can be saved from its tremendous consequences.

* John ix. 40.

Finally, we may learn the necessity of consistency in religion. It is your duty, to be zealous in all the matters of God, in all those things which are the subject of Divine Revelation. There may be a call in Providence, from a concurrence of circumstances, for displaying more zeal about one part of truth than about another; particularly when it is in danger of perishing, or generally despised and rejected. But beware of being so zealous about any truth of comparatively less importance, as to let those slip which are of the utmost consequence to God's glory and your salvation. All truths are pearls; but there are some of more value than others, as being more nearly connected with the pearl of great price. Endeavour to attain that spiritual discernment, which will enable you to distinguish between things that really belong to religion, and such as are merely indifferent. Although you ought not to part with one jot of the law; you must be equally concerned not to add any thing to it: for this tends to lead your minds astray from your principal concerns, and to restrain the Christian liberty of your brethren, often in things which are trivial, and sometimes in those that are ridiculous. Nay, hereby you offer vain oblations unto God, and are in danger of making his commandments of none effect by your traditions.

S E R M O N XII.

ON THE DECEITFULNESS OF THE HEART, WITH REGARD TO THE COMMISSION OF SIN.

PSALM xxxvi. 2.

He flattereth himself in his own eyes, until his iniquity be found to be hateful.

OF such unspeakable consequence is it to us, in all the duties of religion, to be delivered from our own deceitfulness, that our Lord first of all began to say unto his disciples; Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy. So powerful and prevalent is it, that, like leaven, it hath diffused itself through the whole man. All the powers of the soul are tainted with it. All our thoughts, words and actions bear the marks of its pollution. The very members of our body are affected by its contaminating influence. Our eyes, and lips, and hands are taught to speak and practice deceit. So that this corrupt mixture hath leavened the whole lump of our nature. As our deceitfulness is compared to leaven; the Spirit of God metaphorically describes the sincerity of the saints under the notion of their being unleavened; therefore we are required to purge out the old leaven, and to keep the feast with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.

IN this Psalm we have a description of sin, especially as it appears in those who have openly broken God's bands. The introduction is very striking; The transgression of the wicked saith within my heart, that there there is no fear of God before his eyes. How could the transgression of the wicked speak within the heart of him, who in the inscription of the Psalm declares himself to be the servant of JEHOVAH? These words are generally understood as signifying that the outward conduct of the sinner, as often as he thought of it, naturally suggested this conclusion to his mind, that he was destitute of all fear of God. But they may perhaps admit of another meaning, equally agreeable to the literal reading; wickedness saith of the wicked, within my heart, &c. According to this view, the Psalmist meant that notwithstanding the external pretences of the wicked, and all their attempts to cover their iniquity, he was certain that they had no real sense of the presence of God, that they secretly renounced his authority. How was he assured of this? By a comparison of their conduct with the dictates of the heart. He could not indeed look into their hearts, but he could look into his own; and there he found corruption so strong, that were it not for the fear of God that was implanted within him, he would be as bad as they. The difference between him and them lay in this only, that he was the servant of the Lord, by whom his bands had been loosed, by whom he had been delivered from the dominion of his natural depravity. But when he saw such wickedness in their lives, and compared it with the tendency of the heart, as attested by his own experience, he might safely conclude that they had cast off the fear of God. For this he found was the only thing that restrained him. And this indeed was a very fair method of trial. He knew that as the hearts of all were formed alike, there was a secret sympathy of operation, correspondent to this similarity of frame. For as in water face answereth to face, so the heart of man to man. He, as well as they, was shapen in iniquity, and conceived in sin.

HE afterwards introduces some evidences derived from the outward conduct of the sinner, which led him

him to form this conclusion as to his heart: The words of his mouth are iniquity and deceit, he hath left off to be wise, and to do good.—He setteth himself in a way that is not good; he abhorreth not evil. But judging from his continuance in iniquity, he previously gives an account of its progress in his heart, and of its hardening nature: He flattereth himself in his own eyes. The matter which this self-flattery especially concerns is sin, as appears from the following clause. He deceives himself as to its nature and consequences, its evil and aggravations; and he continues to do so, until his iniquity be found to be hateful, till it be fully discovered, and appear in its magnitude and atrocious circumstances both to himself and others, by some awful Divine judgment, such as that mentioned in the last verse of the Psalm. There are the workers of iniquity fallen; they are cast down, and shall not be able to rise. He adduces this self-deceit and continuance in it, as illustrating the truth of that judgment he had formed of the state of such a person: There is no fear of God before his eyes. For he flattereth himself in his own eyes. And surely the proof is incontrovertible. For a man under the bondage of sin would never flatter himself in his own eyes, were it not that God is not before them. The reason why he thinks so well of himself is, that God is not in all his thoughts. He hath cast off all fear about himself, because he hath no fear of God.

FROM these words it is proposed to mention some evidences of inward deceitfulness, with regard to the commission of sin.

HERE it may be necessary previously to observe,

1. THAT all the proofs of the deceitfulness of the heart, which we mean to offer with regard to sin, may not be found in every person, especially in those who are under its power. As to those who work sin, whose constant employment it is to commit sin; as they do it with greediness; as there is no fixed principle principle within them opposing it, whatever occasional opposition may be made by the natural conscience or temporary convictions; as they require fewer excitements to the commission of it: the heart does not need to unfold many of its stratagems, because they sin with all their heart. Some of those instances of deceit, which we have in our eye, will be more generally found with true believers, who, as their mind, their renewed part is constantly opposed to sin, however often overpowered by it, are not only hurried away by the force of corruption, but ensnared by its subtilty. They do not habitually, like the unrenewed, fall into the pit the moment that it is digged; nor do they voluntarily entice themselves to the commission of sin; but they struggle against it, till they are enticed and overcome by their own deceitfulness.

2. MANY of those things, which are evidences of the deceitfulness of the heart, may be used as temptations by Satan. For his snares are generally formed upon the deceits of the heart. The wind of Satan's temptation commonly blows along with the tide of corruption within, whether by deceit, or by violence. Were not this the case, Satan would be divided against himself, and opposing the interests of his own kingdom. When he entered into Judas, it was only to stir up his natural covetousness. If we may suppose him at any time opposing the current of any particular lust, it is with a view to open the sluices to one comparatively more abominable, or because, from his hellish policy, he perceives that the indulgence of one corruption would not answer his present designs, so well as the indulgence of another. The general coincidence between the deceits of the heart and the temptations of Satan, makes it extremely difficult to distinguish the one from the other: for those temptations that may at one time arise from the corruption of the heart, may at another proceed from the activity of this adversary. Most probably, there is no temptation that Satan can manage against a person, person, which may not, at some time, or in some measure, proceed from his own deceitfulness.

WE may now observe that the deceitfulness of the heart appears,

1. IN raising doubts in the mind, with respect to what one is inclined to, whether it really be sin. It is a very common stratagem of the heart, to make the person question the reality of sin in any particular action, when lust excites him to the commission of it; although it be directly against the clearest precepts of the law, the light of the understanding, and the dictates of conscience. Such doubts will more readily arise concerning an action, with regard to which there is nothing expressly revealed; although by clear scriptural consequence, there may be sufficient reason to conclude that it is a transgression of the law. As they appear in the mind, which, strictly viewed, is the seat of thought and reflection; they owe their origin to the heart, which is the seat of will and choice. This indeed is the leading cause of the commission of sin. The affections, which are the inferior part of the soul, and the instruments by which the will expresses its inclinations, gain the ascendant over the understanding, which is the superior. If this faculty be under the power of sin, the affections habitually take the lead. If it be partly enlightened in a gracious manner, the affections, notwithstanding, when a fit opportunity is presented, often blind it by their allurements, and subject it by their influence. Therefore, those who are in a state of nature, are said to walk in the vanity of their mind, having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness, or, as it may rather be read, the hardness of their heart *. The obduracy of the heart, its proneness to sin, is here assigned as one great reason of ignorance; because it increases the darkness of the understanding. What sin soever the heart desires to perpetrate, it wishes, if possible, to view as no sin; sin; that it may be done with less reluctance from conscience, and according to the person's deluded imagination, with less danger of punishment; as if wilful ignorance could excuse us before God. Sin was first introduced into the lower creation by a doubt. Eve first doubted the evil of eating of the forbidden tree, and the certainty of the penalty, before she disbelieved and ate.

* Eph. iv. 17. 18

THE heart, when it prevails so far, as to inspire the mind with doubt as to the sinfulness of an action, will then urge that at the worst it can only be a sin of ignorance, and that God will either not punish it at all, or pass it over very slightly. The Spirit of God, speaking by the wise man, takes notice of this apology, and illustrates its deceitfulness from a consideration of that contempt that the Searcher of hearts will pour upon it. If thou forbear to deliver them that are drawn unto death, and those that are ready to be slain: If thou sayest, Behold, we knew it not: doth not he that pondereth the heart, consider it? And he that keepeth thy soul, doth not he know it? And shall not he render to every man according to his works.*

2. IN trying to persuade him that it is a little sin. If the understanding will not be betrayed into a belief that the matter proposed is no sin at all, the heart will strenuously plead that it scarcely deserves the name. Its reasonings on this head are exceedingly deceitful. It will remind the person, that there is no man who liveth and sinneth not; that every man has some evil about him; that it is vain for him to expect to be altogether free of sin, for thus he would claim greater perfection than any saint on earth, nay, greater than God himself hath allotted to any man in this imperfect state; and that if no man can be altogether delivered from sin, he may surely indulge himself in that which he knows is comparatively little; that it is better to commit this, than a greater one, which might probably be the case, as he cannot wholly subdue his corruptions; that it is wisdom to chuse the least of two evils, and, perhaps, prevent a greater sin by a less; and, in a word, that God cannot be much offended at the commission of so trivial an offence, when one abstains from many that are far more dishonouring to him. The heart, in this case, presents the same plea with Lot for Zoar; Spare this, for it is a little one. Ephraim is introduced as expressing its genuine language in palliating guilt; *In all my labours, they shall find none iniquity in me, that were sin.—“Although I am “not altogether blameless,” saith the deceitful heart, “yet nothing can be found in me of so great importance as really to deserve the odious appellation “of sin.”

* Prov. xxiv. 11, 12.

3. By representing the mortification of sin, as affording far less pleasure than the gratification of it. Sinners know well enough that it is necessary for them to mortify sin; because it is expressly declared, that if we live after the flesh, we shall die. They know that whosoever is in the flesh cannot please God; and that no unclean thing shall enter within the new Jerusalem. But their corrupt and deceitful hearts tell them, in reply to all their convictions, that the task of mortification is not only extremely difficult, but extremely unpleasant; and that it is much more for their ease and satisfaction to indulge sin, than to endeavour its destruction. The heart discloses all the pain, labour, anxiety, and struggling, that a person must undergo in crucifying one lust; and thence argues the great improbability of getting all those of the old man crucified. It heightens the colouring, and increases the dimensions of the picture, to make it the more disgusting to the eye of sense and carnal reason. Nay, it will presume to urge, not only the difficulty, but the unreasonableness, the cruelty of attempting totally to subdue sin. “Are passions,” may it say, “implanted in man by his Creator, and “can we ever suppose that he requires him to eradicate them? Hath he communicated desires; and “can it be unlawful to gratify them? Hath he favoured us with enjoyments; and must we deny “ourselves

* Hof. xii. 8.

“ ourselves the use of them? Would it not be unjust
 “ to suppose so compassionate a Being to punish men, “ for what is natural to them; or to require that they “ should entirely devote themselves to a melancholy “ life, and voluntarily renounce every blessing and “ comfort of society?” It gives as false a representation, as if God, when calling us to subdue sin, required that we should be denied to all our natural feelings and enjoyments, while he only directs us to the moderate and innocent use of them; as if he enjoined us to deny ourselves every comfort, while he only points out the way to the real enjoyment of temporal comforts, and to the possession of those which are spiritual, endless, and unfading in their nature. The very slaves of sin, if they would suffer themselves to reflect but for a moment, must be persuaded of the falsity of this reasoning. For there is really more trouble and vexation occasioned to the sinner, in his unremitted endeavours to satisfy his corruptions, than all that is felt by the believer, in mortifying his. Lust is absolutely insatiable. Like the grave, like the bar-ren womb, it ever cries; Give, give, for it is not enough. Gratify it in one instance, and this is only opening the door to its importunate cravings in another. Do every thing in your power to make provision for the flesh; fatigue your body, wound your conscience, waste your substance, and rack your invention in discovering renewed gratifications: and, after all, it is more unsatisfied than before. It still rises in its demands. Newly invented gratifications, as they enlarge the capacity of enjoyment, enlarge the desire. It seeks to plunge you deeper and deeper in guilt. It may delude you, by saying; “ Give me this “ one gratification farther, and I will ask no more.”
 But how often have you found its deceitfulness? For it hath another, and generally, a more wicked demand to present immediately after. Every corruption, how modest soever it may seem in its sollicitati-ons, on its first appearance, still seeks to drive its subject to the very utmost of iniquity that can be perpetrated

trated in its service. Add to this ; that, as lust, after all its gratifications, is still unsatisfied, the soul is far more so. Thereby not only does a man purchase to himself everlasting misery, but a great portion of present anguish ; so that a few moments of the horror of conscience, which has been at times felt by the most guilty sinner, inexpressibly overbalance all the transitory pleasure in the enjoyment of sin. Now, if we compare this with the exercise of the renewed soul, in the mortification of sin, we will find that the difference is exceedingly great. Every child of God, who through the Spirit has learned to mortify the deeds of the body, will be ready to declare, that he has experienced joy unspeakably more solid and satisfying in the mortification of sin, than he ever did in its gratification ; and that the toil of fulfilling the desires of the flesh, and of the mind, far exceeds that of resisting them in the strength of grace. The one is a pleasure, succeeded and often accompanied by anguish and horror, which consume its very essence ; the other, a pleasure unattended by a pang, save that which the unrenewed nature feels. The one is labour, without any reward, but that of death ; the other is a labour of love, accomplished in obedience to an affectionate Father : a labour, which constitutes an eminent part of the present delightful enjoyment of the life of God, and which shall be finally crowned with a rich recompence of reward, in that state in which sin shall be no more.

4. SIN is exhibited as far more pleasant than it is really found in the commission. The corrupt heart and carnal affections, which are attached to sin, delineate it as attended by the greatest pleasure or advantage. The prospect of that delight, which one expects to find in the indulgence of sin, is but a gay illusion, presented by the deceitful heart. The sinner, in general, lives only by hope. He is disappointed in the gratification. The enjoyments of sin are like the apples of Sodom, which, how fair soever they appear to the eye, when grasped by the hand are

are said to fall to ashes. *He that soweth iniquity, shall reap vanity. Solomon, the beloved of the Lord, when left to fall into a course of sin, was by the event fully convinced of the deceitfulness of his heart. From his elevated situation, he had an opportunity of making a fuller and more extensive trial than the most of men. Pushed on by the ardour of hope, he pursued pleasure through all its supposed retreats; and the result of all his gratifications and researches, is contained in that striking declaration; Vanity of vanities, vanity of vanities; all is vanity and vexation of spirit. The heart often seduces to indulgence in some carnal joy, some sinful pleasure; but it is found, that even in joy the heart is sorrowful, and that the end of that mirth is heaviness. Therefore, saith the Spirit of God; What fruit had ye in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? for the end of those things is death †. He does not merely refer the vanity and unsatisfactoriness of carnal enjoyments to the test of that sorrow and shame, which men feel, after being brought to genuine repentance. He is willing to risk the issue on the trial of those very feelings that they had in their unconverted state. What fruit had ye in those things? “What did all the honours, pleasures “and profits you promised yourselves in sin amount “to? Was not the sum-total not only vanity, but “vexation of spirit? Did they not, in the end, bite “like a serpent, and sting like an adder? As their “natural and direct end, their proper wages and “fruit, is death; had you not many earnestness of this “in the bodily pangs, and especially in the agonies “of spirit and remorse of conscience, which closely “followed them?”

5. It represents a renewed opportunity of sin, as promising far greater satisfaction than was ever found before. As the person must necessarily remember that sin deluded him in the enjoyment; to set aside this objection to the renewed practice of it, the heart pledges itself, that on another trial sin will bring with it a great accession of pleasure. Sin often assumes a new

* Prov. xxii. 8.

† Rom. vi. 21.

new disguise, to conceal that vanity which has been formerly found in it. Indeed, the heart submits to a great deal of trouble, that it may give sin a keener edge, and increase its pleasantness. The sinner would seem, at times, to be satiated with the sameness, and wearied out by the emptiness of frequent gratification. But the heart endeavours to stimulate him, by preparing new allurements. In enticing itself and the other powers to sin, it acts the same part with the adulteress, so strikingly described by the wise man ; I have decked my bed with coverings of tapestry, with carved works, with fine linen of Egypt. I have perfumed my bed with myrrh, aloes and cinnamon *. What a fool is the sinner in thinking God a hard master ! He is infinitely better than the deceitful heart ; for it promises and never performs : but he gives both strength for his service, and a glorious reward. The heart, as unrenewed, is a worse master than Satan himself : for he sometimes ceases to tempt ; but the heart is never at rest : and often when Satan gives over a temptation, it takes it up again, and pushes it with greater violence than before. The worldly-minded man, how much soever he has been formerly disappointed in his expectations, or in the comfort which he apprehended would arise from his success, is by his heart persuaded to devote himself to the world anew, and with more keenness than ever, under the flattering prospect of greater success, and of greater satisfaction. The sensualist, who is perhaps sick of sin, because of the fatal consequences of his debauchery, is encouraged to begin again, from the false hope that his next scene of dissipation will afford him pleasure, superior to any that he has found before. Thus the fallacious heart goes on, adding promise to promise, and hope to hope, till, in the end, either mercy or judgment discover them to be equally vain and unsatisfactory.

6. It pleads that one may indulge sin a little, without altogether yielding to the sin particularly in view. The heart does not discover all its depths of wickedness

* Prov. vii. 16, 17.

ness at first, especially if there be a principle of grace to oppose it; finding it the surest course to proceed by degrees. In its temptations, as temptation is indeed ascribed to it, (James i. 14.) it goes on like Satan. The great point he aimed at, in his assault upon our spotless Head, was to prevail with him, if possible, to deny his Deity by devil-worship. But he appears at first to be very moderate in his demands. While he insinuates a doubt of the truth of his Divinity, he pretends a care for his natural life, as he was then an hungred; and will have him to display his power, by converting stones into bread. In his next attack, he wishes him to tempt Providence, by unnecessarily exposing himself to danger. Not till the last, does he produce his most arrogant demand of express worship from the Son of God. In like manner, the corrupt heart, in tempting to sin, seeks but a little at first, and pretends that it will be satisfied with a little. The natural conscience, at least, would recoil at the immediate proposal of the greatest wickedness. Even the wicked Hazael, when the Prophet foretold what he would do to the people of God, seems to shudder at the idea; *Is thy servant a dog, saith he, that he should do this great thing. Elifha made no other reply than this; The Lord hath shewed me, that thou shalt be king over Syria. By insinuating to him what he was, perhaps, even then resolved to do to his master, he proved the certainty of what he would do to Israel. As if he had said; "The man who can do the one, will find little difficulty with the other." The deceitful heart has enough of that wisdom that is devilish, to know, that if a man be enticed to tamper with sin, or to sin a little, he is in a fair way to proceed to all that exceeds in sin to which it wishes to hurry him. It intreats that sin should at least obtain a hearing. It insinuates that it is very weak in a man to be so jealous of his own strength, as to suppose that he can be in any danger from merely listening to what sin hath to offer for itself. Or it argues, that one may indulge sin a little, and easily retreat, when there is any any danger of going too far ; that sin is a very delicious morsel, and may be rolled under the tongue, without being swallowed. Thus was the heart first poisoned, by listening to the deceitfulness of Satan, and disbelieving God. Eve first looked on the tree ; then she saw that it was pleasant to the eyes ; then she proceeded to touch it ; then to eat ; and, last of all, to act the part of a tempter to her husband.

* 2 Kings viii. 13.

7. IT throws a veil of forgetfulness over the whole soul, with respect to all the painful consequences of sin, formerly felt. Upon a renewed allurement to the commission of sin, even the natural conscience is ready to suggest its former bitter fruits. The heart itself, perhaps, still retains the impression of its stings. But it discovers a peculiar power of deceit in concealing these, as if they had never been ; in deadening any remaining sensations of this kind ; and in persuading itself that all was mere apprehension. That loathsomeness of sin, hatred of self on account of it, or fear of wrath, which the person experienced after a former indulgence, are entirely vanished ; and he now appears to himself as one who feared where no fear was. Whence does this arise, but from the deceitfulness of the heart, that uses all its influence to suppress convictions, and to bury in oblivion a sense of the past bitterness of sin ? When the Spirit works, either in a common or gracious way, by inward motions, in opposition to sin ; representing it as contrary to the holy law, as dishonouring to God, as ruining to the soul ; when it recals to view the former unpleasant consequences of it ; or directs to the heart and conscience a word in season ; the heart, as unrenewed, discovers its deceitfulness, by treating all these as dreams. It endeavours to ridicule a man out of any regard to them, as being childish or enthusiastic fears, and unnecessary restraints. It attempts to quench this holy fire of the Spirit's kindling, by the filthy torrent of its own corruption ; to extinguish this candle of the Lord, by the storm of lust which it awakes. Thus all the affliction and the misery, the wormwood and the gall, which, in consequence of sin, have formerly embittered the soul, are forgotten in a moment: as God complains to his ancient people, when reproving them for renewed transgressions; In all thine abominations and thy whoredoms, thou hast not remembered the days of thy youth, when thou wast naked and bare, and polluted in thy blood *.

have

8. IT entices the imagination into its service. This is not only Satan's workhouse in the soul; but it may be viewed as a purveyor, which the heart engages in making provision for its lusts. When sinful motions arise in the heart, by it they are immediately transmitted to the imagination, that it may minister fuel to corruption. This power cheerfully obeys the summons. Being nearly connected with the senses, being the channel in which the ideas of external objects are communicated to the mind; it awakes within itself the agreeable impressions formerly made by the indulgence of sin; calls in the assistance of memory; invents the means of fulfilling the desires of the flesh, and of the mind; and thus ripens the motions of sin communicated by the heart, and remits them to it, in a more perfect form, to receive the consent of the will, by which the act is inwardly completed. Mournful is the description given us of this inventive faculty, in consequence of its depravation by sin: God saw, that every imagination of the thoughts of man's heart was only evil continually †. And this is still the case in the eye of Omniscience; for God makes the same declaration immediately after the flood, before he took another trial of man; because he knew that this wickedness was not peculiar to any age, or to any race, but inherent in human nature, in consequence of original apostasy: and that it was not so by reason of example; for the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth ‡. Not only is this power instrumental in preparing the intoxicating potion of iniquity for the heart, and in hurrying on to the perfection of the outward act of sin; but it multiplies iniquities, increases the filth, and greatly adds to the guilt of the person, by acting sin over and over again within itself,

VOL. I.

G g

* Ezek. xvi. 22.

† Gen. vi. 5.

‡ Gen. viii. 21.

self, long after it has been actually committed, and when, perhaps, there is no opportunity of a renewed commission. It ruminates on sin; it recalls the impressions it has made with pleasure, at least, without becoming abhorrence; whence a wish often arises in the heart, for as good an occasion as formerly has been either embraced or rejected. This is one article in the accusation brought by God against Aholibah, the type of the Jewish Church, expressive of her grateful recollection of ancient idolatry: Yet she multiplied her whoredoms, in calling to remembrance the days of her youth, wherein she played the harlot in the land of Egypt *.

9. It engages the senses on its side. These are volunteers to the corrupt heart, which it arms in its service, and by which it accomplishes its wicked purposes, when enticing to outward acts of sin. It is not enough to the deceitful heart to raise a confusion and combustion in all the powers of the soul. It excites a perturbation in the whole man, and tries to actuate and employ the members of the body as the instruments of unrighteousness unto sin: like a thief who sets the whole house on fire, that he may have an opportunity, by the confusion occasioned, of carrying off the goods that it contains. When it would allure to avarice or uncleanness, it directs the eye to gilded treasures, or to an object fit to excite sinful desires. Hence avarice is called the lust of the eye; and unclean persons are said to have eyes full of adultery, and that cannot cease from sin. Observe the progress of sin in the heart of Achan. He saw, and coveted, and took, and hid in his tent †. When the heart would excite to vanity or ambition; the ear shall be regaled with flattery, or the delusive sound of applause. Would it tempt to gluttony or drunkenness? It grasps at things which are pleasant to the taste. Thus, by stirring up a flame in the sensitive part of the man, he becomes a more easy prey to its deceits. For the voice of the senses will always overpower that of the understanding; if they be not brought into subjection, or presently restrained by grace.

* Ezek. xxiii. 19.

† Jos. vii. 21.

10. IN representing sin as properly one's own, as something belonging to one's self. As it endeavours to cast a veil over the hatefulneſs of ſin, ſo alſo over the horror of it, as in any degree ariſing from Satan; that the perſon may more readily comply with its inſtigations. When a man is enticed to ſin, however pleaſant it be to his unrenewed part, or to the whole man as unrenewed, how gratifying ſoever to his ſenſes; he would yet in ſome meaſure recoil at the thought, were he fully convinced that Satan were ſtanding at his right hand, ſeeking his utter deſtruction. Now, as Satan and the deceitful heart go hand in hand in temptation, it is one of its devices, and alſo, one of his wiles, if poſſible, to perſuade a man that he has no ſhare in the preſent temptation. Sin, although in itſelf it would be nowiſe diſagreeable, would yet appear ſhocking, were it viewed as the immediate ſpawn of the devil. But when a man conſiders it merely as the offspring of his own heart, he looks upon it with far leſs reluctance; whatever may be urged againſt it by a natural conſcience, or by the principle of grace.

S E R M O N XIII.

ON THE DECEITFULNESS OF THE HEART, WITH REGARD TO THE COMMISSION OF SIN.

PSALM xxxvi. 2.

He flattereth himſelf in his own eyes, until his iniquity be found to be hateful.

IN the preceding diſcourſe, we have, in ſeveral inſtances, illuſtrated the deceitfulneſs of the heart, with regard to the Commission of Sin, we proceed to obſerve that it farther appears,

11. BY

11. BY insinuating that committing such a sin once more cannot greatly increase our guilt. Perhaps the heart is engaged in alluring to a sin frequently committed before. In this case it urges, that it is not like the commission of a new sin, that it is only to make a very inconsiderable addition to the old score. To serve its present purposes, it may grant that if it were a new sin, a farther progress in the same kind of sinning, or a repetition of any sin with aggravated circumstances, then it would be dangerous and to be avoided. But it pleads an indulgence for an old, beloved iniquity, just as a man does for a friend, with whom he has long been on a footing of intimacy. Thus, it deludes the person by its wicked suggestions, making him believe that there is less guilt in the commission of a sin, which has been often committed before; while no reasoning can be more false: for the longer that any sin is indulged, it becomes the more provoking to God, and the more dangerous to the soul. Instead of being alleviated by the frequency, the guilt of every renewed transgression is greatly aggravated; because it is committed against the more frequent warnings of conscience, testimonies of the Lord's displeasure by Word and Providence, and instances of his unspeakable long-suffering. Therefore, a continuance in the practice of any sin, or return to it, after it has been in some measure renounced, is mentioned as a great aggravation of the guilt of any person or people: *They turned back and tempted God. It procures an awful increase of wrath: They have returned to provoke me to anger,—therefore will I also deal in fury; mine eye shall not spare, neither will I have pity: and though they cry in mine ears with a loud voice, yet will I not hear them†. They sin more and more—therefore they shall be—as the chaff that is driven with the whirlwind out of the floor, and as the smoke out of the chimney‡.

12. THE heart will urge the vanity of attempting to resist the temptation. It will plead for yielding to

* Psa. lxxviii. 41. † Ezek. viii. 17, 18. ‡ Hof. xiii. 2, 3.

to the present assault, from former instances of insufficiency in opposing one of the same nature. "What?" may it say, "art thou now become stronger than at such a time, when thou usedst every effort to withstand a sollicitation to this very sin; but all in vain? Hast thou received any hidden strength formerly unknown? Notwithstanding thy late defeat, are thy locks so well grown that thou canst think of being victorious over thine enemies?" It may urge present felt weakness. "Art thou so foolish," may it say, "as to think of resistance at this time with any prospect of success; when thy affections are already engaged, when conscience is become more calm in its remonstrances against the sin, when the means are at hand, and nothing hinders the indulgence, but the feeble reluctance of the will to a formal consent?" It may reason, according to the nature of the temptation, from the example of others who were eminent saints. "Art thou more temperate than Noah, more righteous than Lot, more upright than Abraham, who lied twice that he might save his life? Art thou more meek than Moses, more patient than Job, more holy than David, or more faithful than Peter? If such cedars were forced to bow before the blast of temptation, shall so bruised a reed, as thou art, resist its force?" In a word, the heart may argue for any particular sin, from the propriety of saving a great deal of time, that must be otherwise lost to no purpose, and of trouble, that must otherwise be unavoidably incurred in fruitless endeavours to stem the torrent. It will insist, that it is better to yield to the temptation at once, because this at length will be the event; and that, till the temptation be gone, the mind will be unfit for every thing else.

13. It may sometimes endeavour to persuade a man, that the present commission of sin will be an antidote for the future, because he will see more of its hatefulness. So deceitful is the heart, that it will not only reason from the pleasantness and profitable-ness of sin ; but, if these arguments be repelled, it will change its strain so far as to reason from the very contrary. The Christian hath found, that after falling into sin, he hath felt a greater hatred of it, and keener resentment against himself for some time, than he felt before ; and that he hath seen more of its abominable nature. He knows that the Lord often suffers his people to fall, that by a deeper sense of their iniquity, they may be more deeply humbled before him ; when for a while, they have been languid in the exercise of religion, and little affected with a sense of the evil of spiritual apostasy. Even this signal display of infinite sovereignty, in not only permitting believers to fall into sin, but in over-ruling their falls for affecting their minds more deeply with a sense of their guilt and impurity, when grace regains the superiority, will, by the wickedness of the heart, be used as an argument for the indulgence of sin. Thus, like Satan, it transforms itself into an angel of light for accomplishing the works of darkness. It will in effect say to the Christian ; “ Thou art at present very dead “ in Religion, and very little affected with a sense of “ the guilt, power and filth of thy sins ; thou per-“ formest no duty in a comfortable manner ; and “ thou hast sometimes found, when formerly in such “ a situation, that even the commission of Sin has “ been an occasion of quickening, and of greater vi“ gour in religious exercises ; and that, for a consi“ derable time, thou hast retained a more affecting “ sense of Sin on thy spirit. Mayest thou not, there“ fore, at present indulge Sin a little, when it will be “ subservient to so excellent a purpose, as to enliven “ thee in the service of God.” The heart, as unrenewed, reasons in this wicked manner, not because it really wishes the person to increase in humility, or that God should sovereignly over-rule his fall as an occasion of his more comfortable rising ; but merely to accomplish its own ungodly designs. For such a sense of sin as it seems to plead for, as the fruit of renewed

renewed transgression, is what, in itself, it would least of all desire.

14. THE heart sometimes urges the commission of sin, as immediately clearing the way to the performance of some necessary duty. It uses that abominable reasoning falsely charged on the first ministers of Jesus, *Let us do evil, that good may come: not merely when, as we have already seen, it pretends to seek an antidote against sin, but when there may be a call to some important service to God. Then, perhaps, it pleads that this cannot be otherwise accomplished. Abraham seems to have thought, that he might venture on a lie, in saying that Sarah was his sister, when it might be the mean of preserving his life, which would otherwise, as he pretended, be in danger †. Doubtless, Jacob flattered himself that he might be excused for his lie, when he was only seeking the blessing, and saw no other way of receiving it from his Father ‡. Saul ventured to offer sacrifices, because the people were scattered from him, Samuel came not within the days appointed, and the Philistines gathered themselves together against him||. When he afterwards went out to war against Amalek, he spared the best of the sheep, and of the oxen, under the pretence of sacrificing them to the Lord, although he had expressly commanded him to slay them all. Even professors in our time will excuse the guilt of lying, if it be a mean of saving their character or natural life, or their property only. How often have men dared to think, nay, to avow to the world, that they did God service, by what are called pious frauds, because, as they pretend, the glory that redounds to God from the end justifies the means. But all who use such impious methods, discover that they are as ignorant of God as Saul was, according to the declaration of the faithful Prophet: *Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams.

15. BY

* Rom. iii. 8.

† Gen. xx. 11.

‡ Gen. xxvii. 19.

|| 1 Sam. xiii. 11.

 1 Sam. xv. 22.

15. BY persuading a person to lay the commission of sin to the charge of the flesh, and solacing him with the idea, that although he fall into it, he does not really love it. He knows that in every believer there is a principle of corruption as well as of grace, that there is a law in the members rebelling against the law of the mind, and often leading him into captivity to the law of sin. The deceitfulness of his heart improves this by pleading, that when he sins it only proceeds from a fatal necessity, arising from this corrupt law, and that he is in some degree excusable, because it is only his flesh, and not his mind, that yields to sin. Thus it tries to persuade him, that he may grant some little indulgence to a beloved corruption; as if it flowed from an absolute necessity, and that he may, nevertheless, retain a sufficient hatred of it in his heart. We see how soon after the entrance of sin the heart sought an excuse for itself. The man said, The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat.—The woman said, The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat.*

16. It dissuades him from prayer. When in the time of temptation, the natural conscience, or the Holy Spirit, either by his common or gracious operations, directs a person to apply to the throne for deliverance, and to bring his lusts to the cross of Christ that they may be mortified; his heart, as unrenewed, dissuades him from this course. Perhaps, it reminds him that he has often tried this exercise before, in like circumstances, when he found an inclination to sin, or was assaulted by a temptation; and that it was attended with no success. Or, it may reason in so wicked a manner as this; that if God hath determined to permit his fall at this time, prayer will not prevent it; as if this were an argument against the use of means appointed by God himself for obtaining deliverance from sin; or as if the means were not, in the Divine purpose, inseparably connected with the end. Perhaps, it will suffer him to try this duty;
but

* Gen. iii. 12. 13.

but still make such efforts as to baffle the professed design. He is rendered totally unfit for performing it. He prays indeed; but it is in hypocrisy. What he asks, he does not really wish to be granted. It would be a disappointment to him, were the Lord to hear him and subdue the power of his lusts. Or, if it allows him in peace to address God in prayer, it immediately renews its assault, and urges him to use his prayer as a sort of salvo with God and conscience, for the commission of the sin; insinuating to him, that it is not properly his blame that he has fallen, because he prayed for deliverance, and was not heard. It is, indeed, a sad display of the wickedness and deceitfulness of the heart, that persons sometimes as it were, prepare themselves for the more unrestrained commission of sin by their duties. This is emphatically described by Solomon, as the case with the insidious adulterers: I have peace-offerings with me; this day have I paid my vows. Therefore came I forth to meet thee, diligently to seek thy face *.

17. It strives to banish a sense of the Presence and Omniscience of God. Well does the corrupt heart know, that an affecting persuasion of the All-seeing Eye being on the person, as long as he retains it, will be a preservative from sin. Therefore, it does every thing in its power to efface this persuasion. It will even dare to insinuate, that perhaps God does not pay so much attention to human affairs, as we are apt to imagine; that it would be unworthy of so exalted a Being to interest himself about every trivial offence of his creatures, or, if it cannot entirely overpower this sense of the Divine Presence, it will endeavour to efface the impression of it in the mean time, and to throw such a mist over a man's eyes, that he shall lose the present effect of this persuasion, and believe the presence of God in as unaffecting a manner, as if he did not believe it at all. When he loses either this persuasion itself, or the present impression of it, he can have no guard against the present commission of sin. For, often the fear of God as Omniscient, awes the mind, when a sense of his love and of the evil of sin have no influence. God gives this as a reason, why men indulge sin in the secret chambers of imagery. Thus he said to Ezekiel; *Son of man, hast thou seen what the ancients of the house of Israel do in the dark, every man in the chambers of his imagery; for they say, The Lord seeth us not, the Lord hath forsaken the earth.

* Prov. vii. 14. 15.

18. THE deceitfulness of the heart about sin, eminently appears in its self-hardening influence. Sin is the instrument which it uses in this work. Therefore it is said; Exhort one another daily, while it is called to day, lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin †. No man is hardened through the deceitfulness of sin, any other way than by reason of the deceitfulness of his own sinful heart; or, in other words, by the activity of his heart in deceiving itself. This self-hardening power of the heart by means of sin, appears, when there are different branches of any one sin, or parts necessary to the completion of it. When the heart enters on the way of iniquity, how rapid is its progress! Achan first looked on the accursed thing; he no sooner looked than he coveted; he no sooner coveted than he took; and then he hid it in his tent, thus defying the All-seeing Eye. The ease with which the heart proceeds from one sin to another, is a further demonstration of its great power in hardening itself. But a few hours seem to have elapsed between Ahab's coveting the vineyard of Naboth, and his taking possession of it; after he had, by the instrumentality of Jezebel, murdered the rightful owner, by an unparalleled prostitution of justice and religion ‡. This was also fully exemplified in the conduct of David. First he was gazing idly from the top of his house; then he fixed the eye of sinful desire on another man's wife; then he sent for her, and committed adultery; he next proceeded to horrid injustice and ingratitude, in attempting to deceive his faithful faithful servant Uriah ; and, last of all, he became his murderer. Nay, so much was his heart hardened by the deceitfulness of sin, that he does not seem to have had any just sense of his aggravated iniquity, for many months after. So great was his obduracy, that he condemned himself before Nathan, without ever thinking that the parable was applicable to him. Thus the indulgence of sin has so hardening an effect, that for a time a sense of its evil seems to be entirely gone. The heart affords another evidence of its activity in self-hardening, by its extreme alacrity in framing apologies for sin. From the dreadful situation of fallen Adam, from his consciousness of the deplorable transition he had made from spotless innocence to aggravated guilt, from unspeakable happiness to inconceivable misery, one might have expected that his mouth would have been stopped, and that he would have become guilty before God. But instead of this, we find him impudently saying ; *The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave unto me of the tree, and I did eat. He divides the blame chiefly between the woman and her Maker ; and brings in his own sin, as if it scarcely deserved to be mentioned ; as if it had been an unavoidable consequence of God's gracious gift. Soon also does the heart, when engaged in the practice of sin, disregard the threatenings of temporal judgments. They have made their hearts as an adamant stone, lest they should hear the law, and the words which the Lord of hosts hath sent in his Spirit by the former Prophets†. Even the immediate infliction of temporal judgments cannot deter from sin. Pharoah's heart seems to grow still the harder, the more he is visited by plagues, till at length he involves himself in total destruction. The more the Israelites were punished, the more they saw God's wonders, either of mercy or of judgment, they sinned still the more. They proceeded from murmuring against Moses, to direct rebellion against God. Nay, so hardening is sin, that the heart gradually loses all fear

* Ezek. viii. 12. † Heb. iii. 13. ‡ 1 Kings, xxi. 1.—16.

of

* Gen. iii. 12.

† Zech. vii. 12.

of eternal wrath. The sinner concludes, that God is altogether such a one as himself. He saith in his heart, The Lord will not require it.

THE old man is said to be corrupt according to the deceitful lusts *. The old man denotes the unrenewed nature. It is said to be corrupt, or rather corrupted, because the longer it subsists in its power, it attains the greater strength. It becomes more and more wicked. And the great agency in effecting this progress in corruption, is ascribed to its own lusts. These are ever at work, and by their constant action, support and invigorate the habit of sin. They are here called deceitful lusts, or lusts of deceit, because it is by the vain hopes of pleasure, honour or profit, which they inspire, that men are hurried on to sin, and that the old man is gradually strengthened. Their success in corrupting the soul is in proportion to the deceitfulness of their operation. Thus, the deceitfulness of the heart is represented as the principal agent in the increase of the body of sin, the great mean of the growth of the old man, nay, as the very standard of his stature; for this exactly corresponds to the degree, and to the operation of deceit. This is given as the most distinguishing character of all the lusts of the old man; because it is principally owing to their wonderful power of deceiving, that they are so frequently indulged. The strength of every lust is commensurate with the power of deceit.

19. THE heart will even urge God's readiness to pardon as an excitement to the commission of sin. Is it declared, that God will abundantly pardon, that he will multiply to pardon? Even this will corruption use as an argument for multiplying iniquities. This is indeed a dreadful abuse of pardoning mercy. It discovers the most shocking ingratitude to God, and the greatest wickedness in making his mercy the minister of sin. But the depraved heart often prophesies in the same manner with the false prophets, whom the Lord reproveth. They say still unto them that despise me; The Lord hath said, ye shall have peace: and they say unto every *every one that walketh after the imaginations of his own heart, no evil shall come upon you. Although, in a moment of temptation, the children of God may be so far left as to abuse his mercy; yet, where this course is habitual, where sin is constantly recommended by this hope; it is a certain evidence that men deceive themselves, and that the pardon they seek is not such as God promises. To such sinners he speaks in this awful manner: Those men have set up their idols in their heart, and put the jumbling block of their iniquity before their face, should I be enquired of at all by them? Therefore speak unto them, and say unto them; Thus saith the Lord God, Every man of the house of Israel, that setteth up his idols in his heart, and putteth the stumbling-block of his iniquity before his face; and cometh to the Prophet: I the Lord will answer him that cometh, according to the multitude of his idols; I the Lord will answer him by myself†. Unto the wicked God saith, What hast thou to do to take my covenant in thy mouth? seeing thou hatest instruction, and castest my words behind thee‡.

* Eph. iv. 22.

LASTLY; by endeavouring to drive one to despair, after the commission of sin, as being beyond the reach of mercy. The deceitful heart first flatters into sin by the hope of forgiveness; and when sin is committed, sometimes tries to frighten from applying for mercy, by representing that the opportunity is lost. It is the great aim of the evil heart, as well as of Satan, to keep a man away from God the only refuge. Therefore, upon the commission of sin, especially if it be of an atrocious nature, it would persuade him that it is vain to supplicate mercy, or to expect it. And it takes this plan, in order to harden the person in sinful courses, and to plunge him deeper into sin than before. This God declares to be the language of the heart: They said; There is no hope, but we will walk after our own devices, and we will every one do the imagination of his evil heart§.

WE shall conclude this discourse by calling your attention to the following things, as means for obtaining

* Jer. xxiii. 17.

† Ezek. xiv. 3, 4, 7.

‡ Psal. l. 16, 17.

§ Jer. xviii. 12.

taining victory over the deceits of the heart with respect to sin.

1. IN a dependence on the Spirit, resist the first motions of sin within you. It is necessary, that you should have a constant sense of the sinfulness of these. Because they are secret, because they are not so gross as outward acts of sin, men are fain to persuade themselves, that there may be no sin in them. But their sinfulness evidently appears from these considerations. They are repugnant to the spirituality and extent of the holy law, and to that perfection which it requires. For it reaches to the whole heart. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with ALL thy heart. They oppose the renewed nature in believers; they carry on a war against the principle of grace in them. Therefore, they are called the lustings of the flesh, or unrenewed nature against the Spirit, which denotes that part of the Christian that is renewed, or, as it is materially the same, the Holy Spirit himself dwelling in them as the efficient cause of a new nature, of a new life, and of all its actings. The flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit lusteth against the flesh.—Thus they also counteract and resist the motions of the Spirit. This pure Agent works in and by the new nature already implanted: and these first motions of sin constantly oppose his sacred suggestions.—They are the corrupt seed, from which all actual transgression springs up in the conversation. For from within, out of the heart of man, proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, &c. If the fruit be evil, the root on which it grows must be correspondent. These are the instruments which Satan employs in his work. When he means to excite persons to actual sin, he blows up the corrupt spark within. By these secret motions he stirs them up to outward immoralities.—In a word, they must be evil, because they are the very imaginations of our own hearts. But every imagination of the thoughts of man's heart is only evil,—every figment, the first formation of thought, that is, every motion of the natural heart, is only evil continually.—These motions being evidently sinful, it is therefore of the greatest consequence that they be resisted. For when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin; and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death. These are the conception of sin in the heart, and the conception always tends to the birth. True, sin can only be said to be brought to the birth, when it is actually committed: but it hath as real an existence before, when only conceived. Against these motions you must watch and pray. Especially improve the Holy Spirit for subduing them. If ye, through the Spirit, do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live. All attempts to resist or subdue them, without the Spirit, will be ineffectual. This is one great end of his dwelling in believers, that acting by and on the principle of grace in them, he may lust against the flesh. If ye walk in the Spirit, ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh. If you be thus enabled to resist the first motions of sin, it will at once defeat all the delusive arguings of your hearts.

2. BEWARE of entertaining doubts with regard to what Scripture and conscience declare to be sin. To doubt the reality of sin, is to meet the temptation half way. To doubt is to begin to fall, for it implies unbelief of God's testimony. At any rate, if you hesitate with respect to any thing, whether it be innocent or sinful, and do it with this hesitation, to you it is sin. Even in so trivial a matter as eating, he that doubteth is damned, if he eat. He is condemned by his conscience as guilty of sin; because he does something that he cannot do as to the Lord, being uncertain whether it be not a transgression of his law. In all we do, we ought either immediately or ultimately to propose the glory of God as our highest end. Now, it is impossible singly to propose this as our end in an action, about the nature of which we are uncertain.

3. CAREFULLY avoid light notions of any sin. To think lightly of sin is to think lightly of God.

For

For although some sins be comparatively less aggravated than others, yet every sin is infinitely evil, as committed against an infinitely Holy God. It is impossible that you can, at the same time, entertain light notions of sin and important notions of duty, or of God; of whose nature sin is the very reverse, who hates it with a perfect hatred, who punished it in the person of his only-begotten Son.

4. GUARD against the solicitations of your hearts. If these promise you honour, profit, or pleasure in the service of sin, believe them not. These promises are only like the tears of the crocodile, which is said to weep that it may destroy. Ask your hearts in reply, "If there be any honour in that which is the "shame of man, who was formed after the image of "God; any honour in being more like the Devil, "than you are already? If there be any profit in de- "voting your precious souls to destruction, in despi- "sing eternal life, or in preferring a filthy lust to God "himself as your portion?" Ask them, "If there can "be any pleasure in the ways of death, in that path "that leads down to hell, in defying the justice of an "angry God, or in procuring the anger of a loving "Father; If there can be any pleasure in crucifying "the Son of God afresh, in grieving and doing despite "unto the Spirit of Grace?" Stand in awe, and sin not: Commune with your own heart—and be still.

5. BEWARE of tampering or dallying with sin. This is like sporting with the point of a sword, or at the verge of a pit. Temptation is, to the corrupt heart, sharper than a two-edged sword, and if the point on e enter, you may be pierced through with many sorrows. There is always a snare in sin, and if you begin to trifle with it, you may fall into it ere you are aware. Endeavour resolutely to tear yourselves away from the first solicitations to iniquity. Imitate the conduct of Joseph, who gave this repulse to the first proposals of guilt, How can I do this great wickedness and sin against God? If temptation become more urgent, imitate his flight. For when his adulterous mistress renewed her entreaties at another time, when the absence of the family made the temptation more dangerous; he left his garment in her hand, and fled, and got him out. A flight from sin is truly honourable. For it is an unfair warfare, a man's worst enemies being those of his own house; and it is his glory to be sensible of his inequality for the contest. It is better to suffer a little in your substance, or in your honour, according to the world's estimation, than to comply with the temptation. It is better to leave your garment behind you, like Joseph, than afterwards to depart with a wounded conscience. It is perilous even to reason with sin, because it will prejudice the carnal affections in its favour. Nay, it is sinful to reason with sin. Is it treasonable to hear treason against an earthly Sovereign, and not divulge it? And is it not treason against the God of heaven, is it not lese-majesty, but for one moment to listen to his rival in your hearts, even although you do not actually rebel?

more

6. TRY to get all your senses armed against sin, or rather barred against it; for this is the best mode of defence. The senses are the gates of the affections. It is most ordinarily by them that temptation to outward and grosser sins enters into the heart, and co-operates with the corrupt motions there. Like Job, make a covenant with your eyes. Endeavour to stop your ears against it. For he is said to walk uprightly, who stoppeth his ears from hearing of blood, and shutteth his eyes from seeing evil. Strive for the mastery over your taste. Put a knife to thy throat, lest thou be given to appetite. Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his colour in the cup, when it moveth itself aright. At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder. Thine eyes shall behold strange women, and thine heart shall utter perverse things. Yea, thou shalt be as he that lieth down in the midst of the sea, or as he that lieth upon the top of a mast.

7. SEEK a constant sense of the Majesty and Omniscience of God. When at any time enticed to sin by the deceitfulness of the heart, or by Satan, consider that awful injunction: Be still, and know that I am God.

8. Pray without ceasing against the deceitfulness of the heart. When by it you are solicited to sin, if in company, if you have no opportunity of retiring by yourself, look up to the Lord, in ejaculatory prayer, like Nehemiah, when he presented his petition to the Persian king. Be frequently engaged in secret prayer for the mortification of your corruptions. Put them in the Lord's hand, in the exercise of faith and godly sorrow, saying, I am oppressed; undertake for me. I know not what to do, but mine eyes are towards thee.

ABOVE all, improve the strength of Christ, and the grace of his Spirit for the mortification of sin. These things, already recommended, are as means absolutely necessary in their own place. But if we use or attempt them in our strength, they will be unavailing. *Except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain. It is not said, The watchman waketh in vain, because the Lord keepeth the city; nor simply, The Lord keepeth the city, and the watchman waketh in vain; for either of these would have been a discouragement to the use of means. But the declaration is so laid, that while it shows the vanity of means in themselves, it points out their necessity, as having the impress of Divine institution. For God will have us to be both diligent in duty, and denied to our diligence. So, all the means employed for mortification will be useless, unless we observe the new covenant-way. When the commandment is given, Mortify your members, we are to understand it only as elsewhere explained; If ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live. We must work out our salvation with fear and trembling, knowing and believing that God worketh in us. We must lay aside every weight, and run our race; but it is only as looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith.

S E R-

* Psa. cxxvii. 1.

S E R M O N X I V .

ON THE DECEITFULNESS OF THE HEART, IN STIFLING CONVICTIONS.

JEREMIAH, viii. 5.

They hold fast deceit, they refuse to return.

FROM the connection of that passage formerly illustrated, in which the heart is declared to be deceitful above all things *, it is evident that the Spirit of God especially refers to its deceitfulness in relation to the false grounds of confidence, on which sinners build for eternity. In the prophetic writings, the Spirit of inspiration often infolds spiritual blessings in promises, which seem to regard those of a temporal nature only ; and makes a transition, almost indiscernible, from the one to the other : because the Prophets principally ministred to us the things which are reported in the Gospel. In like manner, secret sins, affecting the state of the soul, are frequently reprov'd in more general language, under the aspect of those open sins, that were chargeable against Israel in a public or political capacity. When the Lord would only seem to reprove his people for trusting in an arm of flesh for temporal deliverance ; he means to describe the far more dangerous folly of false confidence with respect to eternal salvation. And there is generally some particular expression in the description or reproof, which shows its ultimate design, as respecting

* Jer. xvii. 9.

ing the heart. In the passage referred to, God evidently rebukes his people, for their carnal confidence, during their outward calamities; and denounces a curse on those who thus rejected Him. But he gradually speaks more closely, as illustrating the extent both of the curse and of the blessing. It is said of the man that trusteth in the Lord, that he shall not cease from yielding fruit, to declare, that he continues to bring forth the real fruits of holiness. But to insinuate that the worst and most fatal species of carnal confidence, is especially meant, that which regards the state of the heart, which is hid from every created eye, which none but God can discover, either in the certainty or greatness of it; and to illustrate the unspeakable risk that men run of continuing in this delusion, he subjoins; The heart is deceitful above all things.

THE same observation will in some measure apply to the words immediately before us. In the preceding part of this chapter, God threatens to inflict such judgments on his rebellious people, that by the residue of them, death should be chosen rather than life. Then in verse 4. he commands his servant to propose this question to them in his Master's name; Shall they fall, and not arise? Shall he turn away, and not return? This seems to be a declaration of what God knew to be the certain event. Yet he speaks in this manner, to leave them the more inexcusable, in consequence of his expostulation. He continues his address to them, demanding the reason of their obstinate perseverance in defection from him: Why is this people slidden back with a perpetual backsliding? Thus he insinuates that they could give none, that their conduct was in the highest degree irrational. Then he asserts what was evidently the case with them. They hold fast deceit, they refuse to return. These words, as immediately referring to the people of Judah, might denote their preposterous confidence in the assistance of neighbouring nations, or in the testimony of their false prophets, who assured them of peace and prosperity, notwithstanding all God's declarations declarations to the contrary ; and their refusal to return to him in that way which he had enjoined, by faith in his pardoning mercy through the blood of the covenant, and genuine repentance. In general, they express the conduct of sinners under the power of deceit, who reject all the calls, invitations, entreaties and exhortations of God, turn a deaf ear to all the warnings of conscience, and resist all the common operations of the Spirit.

IN opening them further, we propose to consider some of the proofs that the heart affords of its deceitfulness, in the methods which it takes for stifling convictions of sin.

I. MANY drown their convictions in the mire of their lusts. When by the Word, read or heard, they are reminded of the shortness of life, and certainty of death, how do they improve these affecting doctrines? Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we shall die :— reasoning worthy of a beast, could we suppose a beast, but for a moment, capable of reasoning ; because it perisheth, its spirit goeth downward. When conscience is, in some measure, awakened because of former sins, they endeavour to overpower it, by making its load the heavier, that, if possible, it may sink under it altogether, and trouble them no more. They return as the dog to his vomit, and as the sow that was washed, to her wallowing in the mire *. As a dog returneth to his vomit, so a fool returneth to his folly †. No comparison can more justly represent the conduct of a sinner, who is resolved on his wicked courses. As the dog, after easing his loaded stomach, and freeing himself from sickness, devours his own vomit ; so the filthy sinner, has scarcely felt the sickness of sin, in some temporary qualms of conscience, which produce a momentary resolution of renouncing it, ere he returns to work all uncleanness with greediness. For the mouth of the wicked devoureth iniquity ‡. Does such filthiness make our nature shudder, even when we see it in a brute creature ! How much more abominable must

* 2 Pet. ii. 22.

† Prov. xxvi. 11.

‡ Prov. xix. 28.

must the sinner, returning to his lusts, appear before Him who is of purer eyes than that he should behold iniquity? We are apt to wonder, when we see men going on in the greatest wickedness, in the commission of the most shocking enormities, and to apprehend that their hearts must certainly be far worse than those of others; and to be astonished that they seem to have no trouble from their consciences: but the truth is; this is just a picture of the heart of man, when hardened through the deceitfulness of sin. This discovers what any of us would be, did God give us up to our own heart's lust. The reason of their becoming so bold in sin, is not that they have no conscience at all; but that they have in a great measure silenced it. Perhaps, they met with many reproofs from conscience at first, but they immediately hurried back to the very cause of these reproofs, and sinned still; till conscience hath become insensible.

2. MANY extinguish convictions by flying to the world. Multitudes are in this manner ruined for eternity. The heart of the sinner has been affected under the word. Serious impressions have been made for a time. But the cares of the world, and the deceitfulness of riches render them unfruitful: *That which fell among thorns are they, who, when they have heard, go forth and are choked with cares, and riches, and pleasures of this life, and bring no fruit to perfection. Even the innocent enjoyments of life prove the destruction of myriads. Perhaps it may be said, that among those who make a profession, more fall a sacrifice to innocent enjoyments, than to those that are in themselves sinful. They devote their hearts to them. They love them immoderately. And this as certainly ruins them as if they proceeded to the greatest excess; although their guilt may be comparatively less. With regard to the loss of the soul, the question is not so much, what is the enjoyment, as what is the degree of our affection? In the parable of the marriage-feast, when the servants of the king went

* Luke viii. 14.

went to inform those who were bidden, that all things were ready ; they made light of it, and went their ways, one to his farm, and another to his merchandise. It was only the remnant, that entreated his servants spitefully *. As related by Luke †, one excused himself, because he had made a purchase of land ; another because he had bought some oxen for labour ; and a third could not attend the marriage of the King's son because he was himself newly married. One had bought an estate, another was replenishing his farm, and the third was taking care of his wife. There was nothing sinful in their employments. The sin lay in preferring either the business or comforts of life to the invitation of the King, to the concerns of salvation. They preferred broken cisterns to the fountain of living waters. O ! sinners, you may flatter yourselves that there is nothing evil here. But God finds two evils in this conduct : My people have committed two evils ; they have foresaken me the fountain of living waters, and hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns that can hold no water ‡. Forfaking the fountain is the first evil, which leads to the second, that of hewing out broken cisterns, and preferring these to the Fountain. Creature-comforts are, in their best state, only cisterns. Indeed they are of God's hewing. But they have no source of consolation from within. They must have their supplies from above ; and they can contain no more than God is pleased to pour into them. But all the cisterns of sublunary enjoyments have received a fatal rent by the entrance of sin, so that they are broken cisterns that can hold no water. If the poor, and the needy seek water from them, there is none, even although their tongue faileth for thirst. For the creature is made subject to vanity. How great then is your folly in forsaking the Fountain, from whom all true consolation springs ; in forsaking him, who is a Fountain of living waters, who will make all alive, and will afford eternal supplies to all, who come to him ? For the water, that he gives, not only heals, refreshes and preserves from perishing by thirst, all those

* Matt. xxii. 4,—6.

† Luke xiv. 18,—20.

‡ Jer. ii. 13.

those who drink it, but will be in them a well of living water springing up to life everlasting.—Perhaps, relations or friends may perceive them becoming ferocious. They call them morose and melancholy. They advise them to banish their anxious thoughts by lively company, by the vanities of life, by amusements. A drunken frolic, or a gay assembly, or a theatrical entertainment is prescribed as a sovereign remedy for a troubled conscience: and it is inconceivable, what a powerful charm such things are for lulling conscience asleep. Not only whoredom, but wine, and new wine take away the heart. The heart itself loves the prescription of such false friends, it is willing to be taken away. We see what a mournful effect prosperity and pleasure had upon Israel. Jeshurun waxed fat and kicked.—Then he forsook God who made him, and lightly esteemed the Rock of his salvation *.

3. THE hearers of the Gospel often quench their convictions, by doubting the truth of the doctrine. In this way did sin make its entrance into the world; and all along, it has proved a great support of it. The unbelief of the heart comes in to the assistance of the love of sin. “Surely,” saith the sinner, “God doth not hate sin so much as the Scripture declares. We are not to take the threatenings of the Word in their full extent.” Perhaps, corruption and Satan may drive them the length of thinking that the whole Scripture is a cunningly devised fable; because it goes so much against the grain with them. When conscience, as God’s deputy, threatens the sinner with destruction, as the fruit of sin, with the sword of Divine Justice; the deceitful heart acts the same part with the hearers of Jeremiah, when he denounced judgments; They have belied the Lord, and said, It is not he; neither shall evil come upon us, neither shall we see sword nor famine †. How many are there, who, notwithstanding all the threatenings of the Word, and warnings of the Lord’s servants from it, say to themselves; selves; Peace and safety, while sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child? When Lot went out, and said to his sons-in-law, Up, get ye out of this place, for the Lord will destroy this city; he seemed unto them as one that mocked *.

* Deut. xxxii. 15. † Jer. v. 12.

4. MANY stifle their convictions, by turning them into ridicule. Fools make a mock at sin. The scorner beareth not rebuke. They treat the reproofs of conscience, as the men of Ephraim and Manasseh did the posts whom Hezekiah sent, warning them to turn to the Lord, that the fierceness of his anger might turn away from them. They laughed them to scorn, and mocked them †. They mock these messengers of God, and despise his words ‡. They make themselves sick with bottles of wine, and stretch out their hands with scorners §. Such scornful men try to persuade themselves, that they have made a covenant with death, and an agreement with hell, and that the overflowing scourge shall not come unto them. “What?” may they say, “have we any more reason to fear than others? “Multitudes are as bad as we, and yet give themselves no trouble about sin. These silly apprehensions are merely the consequence of a superstitious education, and of false ideas implanted in the tender credulous mind in youth,—old wives fables; which it would be as despicable in us to regard, as to become children over again, and tremble in the dark.” Thus they try to laugh themselves out of convictions, just as a coward endeavours to get rid of his fear, by inward ridicule: not that they really disbelieve the things that give them trouble, but they wish to do so. And by habituating themselves to laugh at the shaking of the spear, like the coward at heart, they may acquire a fictitious courage, and really get the mastery over them.

5. MEN overpower their convictions, by extenuating sin, or apprehending that they are not guilty in the eye of the law, because free of grosser immoralities.

VOL. I.

K k ties.

* Gen. xix. 14.

† 2 Chron. xxx. 10.

‡ 2 Chron. xxxvi. 16.

§ Hof. vii. 5.

ties. This is an error very common among the hearers of the Gospel, arising from the deceitfulness and unbelief of the heart, and from their ignorance of the nature of God, and of the evil of sin. They think nothing deserves the name of sin, but such transgressions of the law as are of the grossest kind, and carry in them the immediate ruin of the sinner himself, or directly tend to the destruction of society. If a man be an adulterer, or dishonest, or a murderer, they will allow that he is a sinner; but if he be externally sober, they cannot think that he merits so harsh an appellation. Nay, you may be at no loss to find some, who are unwilling to bestow it even upon profane swearers, Sabbath-breakers, drunkards, or whoremongers. In a word, a man may do what he will against God, and against himself; if his crimes do not immediately affect his neighbours, they deserve not the name of sin. If a person be outwardly moral, although destitute of the very form of religion, by many he is viewed as a very good man, as an almost perfect character; because unbelief and enmity against God, declared by a contempt of external worship, are esteemed such small-matters as to be unworthy of notice. It is a long time since the deceitful heart invented this false distinction. The Pharisees, overlooking their own pride, legality, unbelief, and malice, not only reckoned themselves righteous, but all who followed them: while they applied the appellation of sinners to Publicans and Harlots, because of the oppressions of the one, and notorious wickedness of the other. To distinguish in this manner, is going farther than Popery itself. For although Papists dream of some sins, which they call venial, as being of little consequence, and easily pardoned, in opposition to others, which they call mortal, because in their account damning in their nature; they still account the first to be sins. But those we speak of, are ready to ridicule the person who will venture to give them this name. It is, indeed, acknowledged, that there are some sins, which are comparatively greater than others, thers, as being more atrocious in their nature, or aggravated in their circumstances. But every sin is in itself exceeding sinful, because the least is a rebellion against an infinite Being, and therefore damning in its nature; and such as without the justifying and purifying efficacy of the blood of Christ, will expose the person to eternal wrath. For, by one sin, and that against a positive precept, which many in our time deem so incredible a matter, that they reduce the whole to an allegory, judgment came upon all men to condemnation. Every thing that is, in any degree, contrary to the nature and law of God, is sin; and every man, while in this world, is a sinner: For there is no man that liveth, and sinneth not.

THIS unjust apprehension, that grosser immoralities only deserve the name of sin, is one great reason that so many gospel-hearers continue to despise the blood of Christ for cleansing. Having escaped the pollutions of the world, they conclude that they are innocent before God, and do not see the necessity of an application to this blood. They say, Because I am innocent, surely his anger shall turn from me. The prayer of such persons, like that of the Pharisee, is all in the strain of self-commendation: *God, I thank thee that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican. This is the reason assigned by our Lord, for his being rejected by the Pharisees: They that be whole need not a Physician, but they that are sick. For I am not come to call the RIGHTEOUS, but SINNERS to repentance. Therefore, he also assures them that Publicans and Harlots should enter into the kingdom before them. But this is as great folly in a spiritual sense, as it would be for a thief or robber to imagine that he was in no danger of the sentence of the law of his country, because he had not yet committed murder; or, for a man indulging himself in strong drink, to apprehend that he run no risk of intoxication, because he could still hold the cup to his head. O! what unspeakable deceitfulness

* Luke xviii. 11.

deceitfulness does this demonstrate in the hearts of men! They will call that innocence which God calls guilt, and that only guilt which exposes them to punishment from men. Many such innocents as you have dreamed themselves down to the pit of perdition, and there learned the nature of sin, where they could never hear of redemption. In vain, do those in that state of remediless misery, who while here have continued to despise the fountain opened, solicit one drop of water to cool their tongue. Sin can no more lose its nature, as dishonouring to God, and ruining to your own souls, because it does not include the ruin of those around you, than fire can be supposed destitute of its destructive quality, because at present it only burns on the hearth, and does not consume your habitation.—Such persons may esteem themselves wise for eternity, and examples to others, because they are not sinners of the deepest dye, while they obstinately contemn salvation through the cross of Christ, and tread under foot the Son of God. To such the Apostle speaks; *Let no man deceive himself; if any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world, let him become a fool, that he may be wise. All outward sobriety, if there be nothing more, will be utterly unavailing, and all confidence in it will in the end be found self-deceit. He, who seems to be not far from the kingdom of heaven, must deny himself, and become a fool in the world's estimation, by being indebted to the Son of God for his righteousness. There were nominal Christians in the days of the Apostle John, who thought themselves free of sin. This apprehension he considers as an evidence not of self-deceit only, but of their total estrangement from the truth: If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. Nay, it is not only lying to ourselves, but giving the lie to God. If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us †. To imagine this, is only to flatter ourselves selves in our own naughtiness, nay, in our own iniquity. It is to suppose ourselves of some importance in the eye of God, while he utterly disclaims us. Therefore, it is a self-deceit of the most dangerous nature. For if a man think himself to be something, when he is nothing, he deceiveth himself. It is self-deceit, aggravated by a vain attempt to mock God, to set aside the force of his law, and to oppose the very existence of his perfections. But be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption: but he that soweth to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting.* You would reckon him a fool, who should sow one grain in the spring, and expect from it grain of a different kind in the harvest. And will you not account him a fool, a self-deceiver, yea, a mocker of himself, who soweth only to the flesh, and yet fondly expects to reap of the Spirit; who flatters himself that the inestimable fruit of life everlasting shall grow up from the feeble seed of outward sobriety? Take heed lest that come upon you, which is written in the Prophets, Behold, I will plead with thee, because thou sayest, I have not sinned †.

* 1 Cor. iii. 18.

† 1 John i. 8. 10.

6. THE heart often stifles convictions by representing eternal concerns as of little importance. By far the greatest part of men, although they see a dying world around them, live as if themselves alone were to be immortal. Or, one might be apt to imagine from their conduct, that they altogether denied the immortality of their souls, and believed that they would perish with their bodies. Whatever be their notional belief, they practically deny the awful doctrine of immortality. How could they otherwise discover so anxious a concern about the perishing trifles of time, about the honours, the pleasures, and the riches of this world; or even about these two simple enjoyments, food and raiment; while destitute of all concern about death, judgment and eternity; if the belief

* Gal. vi. 3. 7. 8.

† Jer. ii. 35.

belief of these things really affected their minds? They discover less wisdom than the beasts of the field, or the fowls of the air, which, if they see one of their number fall, instantly provide for their own safety. But sinners, although they see multitudes of their acquaintance and relations dropping into the grave, are nowise concerned to provide for their safety through eternity. All their anxiety is centred in these inquiries, What shall we eat, what shall we drink; and wherewithal shall we be clothed? They barter their souls with Satan, for the temporary and uncertain possession of these things, which are not his to give. They give him the inestimable price of their souls for those mercies that they can receive from God alone. If you talk to them of death and an eternal state, of the certainty and impartiality of the judgment, of the importance of their souls and salvation; they listen as if all these things were spoken to others, as if they had not the least concern in them. They hear these truths as a tale that hath been often told, and, perhaps, consider you as officious in bringing such disagreeable subjects to their recollection. This false reckoning, with respect to matters of everlasting moment, undoubtedly discovers the astonishing deceitfulness of the heart. But the bitter consequences of this conduct are expressly declared by the Spirit of God: Let not him that is deceived trust in vanity, for vanity shall be his recompence. It shall be accomplished before his time, and his branch shall not be green. He shall shake off his unripe grapes like the vine, and shall cast off his flowers as the olive *. What unspeakable folly and self-deceit is it, for persons who know that it is revealed in God's word that they are formed for immortality, who feel the presages of it within themselves; and who are, at the same time, equally certain that their bodies are mortal, as they receive unquestionable proofs of it every day; and almost every hour, in their own feeble frames, feel the premonitions

* Job xv. 31.—33.

tions of their approaching exit,—to despise all serious consideration of eternity, and to prefer a few transitory comforts to the everlasting possession of God in Christ, perfect conformity to him, and the full enjoyment of him as a Father and Friend? The greater is their folly, as they are assured that godliness is profitable unto all things, having the promise, not only of the life which is to come, but even of the life that now is; and that these things, which now engross their attention, would have far greater security, were they interested in those of eternal moment. This is indeed to struggle for pence, and throw away worlds. It is to prefer time to eternity; although there be less proportion between the one and the other, than between a grain of sand and the whole universe. Even in the saints this deceitfulness greatly appears. True, their supreme concern is about the eternal world. But all their attention is little, compared with the weight and importance of the subject. Did they see the business of eternity in its full value and importance, they would deem all their concern about it as but a kind of serious trifling. For it both demands and deserves the greatest attention possible. Every nerve should be strained; every faculty should be exerted to its utmost, every affection should be swallowed up in the work of an unknown eternity.

7. MANY endeavour to fly from a wounded conscience, and so bold fast deceit by flying from the means of grace. For if any be a bearer of the word, and not a doer, he is like unto a man beholding his natural face in a glass; for he beholdeth himself, and goeth his way, and straightway forgetteth what manner of man he was*. These words show that this course is often very effectual. He forgetteth what manner of man he was. The unregenerate find that some preachers are more awakening than others. They are better qualified as instruments, for discovering to them their spiritual face in the glass of the law.

* James i. 23. 24.

law. These they cannot bear. They forsake their ministry, because they cannot enjoy their false peace under it. Like Ahab, they hate that fellow Micaiah, because he always prophecies evil, and not good. It was the great sin of Israel, that they became weary of all God's dealings with them: But my people would not hearken to my voice, and Israel would have none of me *. The only condition on which such persons will submit to the sound of the Gospel, is that they have nothing but smooth things prophesied to them. This course the wicked Cain took to banish convictions. He went out from the presence of the Lord †. Not as if he could remove to any place, where God could not see him, or where he could be banished from his essential presence. For he fills heaven and earth, and none can hide himself in secret places, that he should not see him? But he departed from the Church of God in his father's family, and from the administration of appointed ordinances. Thus are the words of the Prophet accomplished: Thou hast stricken them, but they have not grieved; thou hast consumed them, but they have refused to receive correction. They have made their faces harder than a rock; they have refused to return ‡.

8. OTHERS extinguish convictions by magnifying the difficulties of religion. It seems to them a great hardship to perform so many duties, to be instant in season and out of season. They reckon God's commandments grievous, and the reward scarcely an equivalent for the labour. It is vain, say they, to serve God; and what profit is it that we keep his ordinances, and that we walk mournfully before the Lord of hosts §. Thus they exclaim, What a weariness is it? and they snuff at it. They cannot consent to abstain from all sin. What! shall they endure the anguish of plucking out a right eye, or cutting off a right hand? Could they enter into life whole, they would do it cheerfully. Like Pharaoh, they think it hard that the only term upon which the Lord can be served, is that not so much as one hoof must be be left. They terrify themselves with the apprehension of the difficulty of bearing reproach. Must they lose their good name, be laughed at by their former friends, and accounted the obscuring of all things? Thus, many of the chief rulers did not confess Christ, because of the Pharisees, lest they should be put out of the synagogue. They represent to themselves a religious life as a life of continual melancholy. They must abandon society, and renounce all innocent mirth. The slothful man saith, There is a lion without, I shall be slain in the streets. They must become poor in their own eyes, and really impoverish themselves by giving to the poor. The young man went away sorrowful, because he had great possessions. He could not think of taking up the cross and following Christ.

* Psal. lxxxi. 11. † Gen. iv. 16. ‡ Jer. v. 3. § Mal. iii. 14.

9. CONVICTIONS are often stifled by the hope of abundance of time, and the promise of a future consideration. While some are altogether unconcerned about eternity, there are others, not quite so hardened, who have some kind of seriousness; but delay the due consideration of their eternal interests, because they think it too early. Thousands and ten thousands fall the miserable victims of a false hope. When the concerns of their precious souls intrude themselves on their thoughts, they endeavour to banish them, from the expectation of length of days, and of a continued enjoyment of a merciful dispensation. Such are spiritual sluggards, who solicit conscience for a little sleep, a little slumber, or at least a little folding of the hands to sleep. This also is a great evidence of the deceitfulness of the heart, for saith the Spirit of God; *The wicked flattereth himself in his own eyes, until his iniquity be found to be hateful. He stifles convictions, resists the ordinary operations of the Spirit, and deludes himself with the hope of life, till hell convince him of that hatefulnes of sin, that he refused to learn from the means of grace. This was the case with that fool of whom we read in the parable. Having pulled down his barns, and built larger ones, and filled

* Psal. xxxvi. 2.

led these with fruits and goods, he said to his soul; *Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years, take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry. Fool indeed! to make fruits and goods, that could only be useful to his body, a portion and source of consolation to his soul. But such is the general folly of mankind. And their sudden and fatal disappointment, like his, often declares its excess. For that very night, his soul was required of him. How soon was the pride of Nebuchadnezzar stained! How suddenly were the blossoms of his self-complacency and vain-glory blasted; and his capacity of solacing himself with those delicious fruits, on which his imagination feasted, ravished from him by Him who causes the arrogancy of the proud to cease! He walked in the palace of the kingdom; he spake and said; Is not this great Babylon that I have built for the house of the kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty? While the word was in the king's mouth, there fell a voice from heaven,—O king Nebuchadnezzar, to thee it is spoken, The kingdom is departed from thee. And they shall drive thee from men, and thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field. The same hour was the thing fulfilled upon Nebuchadnezzar†. Little did this haughty man imagine that the ample inclosures of his palace, the very gardens of his pleasure, and of his pride, which he had laid out and adorned at so great expence, were designed by Providence for a place of pasture to him, in common with his cattle. Could man ensure himself, for a certain series of years, against the stroke of death, were he in any degree lord of his time, there would be some more ground for an apology; though after all, there could be no apology produced of sufficient validity; because man does all in his power to defeat the great end of his being, till brought to obey the command of God, by believing on him whom he hath sent. But for man whose life is in his lip, whose breath is in his nostrils, who is crushed before the moth, whose days pass as a shadow, and are consumed as smoke, for man, who is not certain certain of one moment after the present, to delay the great concern both of time and eternity, is folly in the extreme, and unspeakably greater madness than it would be for one to amuse himself on the brink of a precipice. Therefore, the Spirit of God, in language full of compassion, thus expresses the greatness of their folly; Oh! that they were wise, that they understood this, that they would consider their latter end!

* Luke xii. 18, 20.

† Dan. iv. 29, 33.

LISTEN, then, to the counsel of God, and consider the danger of deceiving yourselves with respect to eternal concerns, by thinking them of little moment, or by imagining that you will have abundance of time to attend to them, ere you die. Satan is much indebted to the deceitful heart for performing his work for him. Thus you do his business, and establish his kingdom. For it is his great aim to persuade sinners to delay the interests of their souls. Encouraged from his success in the first trial, he still manages his old plea with the sons and daughters of Eve; Ye shall not surely die: and with the greatest part he is still successful. From the hope of a delay, at least, of the threatened penalty, they are easily lured to taste of the forbidden tree of pleasure. The impetuous desire of a present practical knowledge of sensual good, makes them overlook the certainty of a future experimental knowledge of penal evil. Hell is filled with sinners who have perished before they have lived half the days that they promised themselves. But, O! consider the danger of this conduct. Hear the word of the Lord, ye scornful;—because ye have said, We have made a covenant with death, and with hell are we at agreement; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, it shall not come unto us, for we have made lies our refuge, and under falsehood have we hid ourselves: Therefore, thus saith the Lord God,—judgment will I lay to the line, and righteousness to the plummet, and the hail shall sweep away the refuge of lies, and the waters shall overflow the hiding place. And your covenant with death shall be disannulled, and your agreement with

*with hell shall not stand; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, then ye shall be trodden down by it. What would the damned, who are wailing in the bottomless pit, give for such offers of mercy as you now enjoy, as you now despise? Would you take their testimony, if you will not believe that of God? Would you listen to their counsel, if you are determined to reject that of the compassionate Redeemer? How would you be affected, were you addressed by one of these prisoners of despair? Well, the substance of their counsel, whatever may be the supposed motives, you have in the parable of the rich man: He said to Abraham, I pray thee, Father Abraham, that thou wouldest send Lazarus to my father's house, for I have five brethren, that he may testify to them, lest they also come into this place of torment. But indeed, if you will not hear Moses and the Prophets, if you will not hear Christ and his Apostles and ministers, neither would you be persuaded, although one rise from the dead. Consider, therefore, what Wisdom is saying to you, even the Personal Wisdom of God, the Lord Jesus; He that sinneth against me, wrongeth his own soul: all they that hate me love death†. You can have no love to eternal death as such, for every creature seeks its own preservation, and every sinner pursues sin under the false notion of good. But while you continue to despise him, you love eternal death in its antecedent, by loving the course that infallibly leads to it. Attend to what the Lord saith to you, even to you, who seem to apprehend, who venture to say by your practice, and perhaps by your very language, that you have made a covenant with death, and with hell are at agreement; Therefore, thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation, a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone, a sure foundation: he that believeth shall not make haste‡. He can stand the hail-storm of Justice, he will be in no danger, when it begins to blow. His house is built on a rock. Or, he shall not be confounded. He shall not be exposed to shame

* Isa. xxviii. 14,—18.

† Prov. viii. 36.

‡ Isa. xxviii. 16.

shame in time, or to that everlasting contempt, which shall be the portion of all foolish builders. Even to you he declares this. You presumptuous and obstinate sinners he welcomes to build on this sure foundation: apply to him, therefore, for faith to embrace and rely on it, both for time, and for eternity.

As this part of the subject is of the utmost moment, we shall improve it more particularly by illustrating the great danger of stifling Convictions.

I. THIS conduct is of the most hardening nature. All sin is so. He who sins to-day, makes the commission of sin easier to conscience to-morrow. Evil men wax worse and worse. There is a progress in sin, as well as in holiness. Is the path of the just as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto a perfect day? The path of the wicked resembles it, in the line of opposition: for their ways go down to death; darkness and destruction are in their paths. Does he that bath clean hands wax stronger and stronger? The wicked also holds on his way. He strengtheneth himself in his iniquity; he strengtheneth himself against the Almighty. And there is no sin of a more heart-hardening nature than this of quenching convictions. When men make their neck an iron sinew, the brow becomes brass. Obduracy in resisting God is always succeeded by effrontery in sin. They acquire a whore's forehead. They declare their sin as Sodom. It must be, in the nature of things, that this sin should be very hardening; because he, who stifles convictions, overleaps God's hedges, and does all in his power to destroy those natural restraints that God hath laid on all, even on heathens themselves; he does his utmost to break God's bands asunder, and cast away his cords from him. If a sinner can once resolve to walk in the imagination of his own heart, he will soon add drunkenness to thirst. The Pharisees, who at first stifled their convictions about the Divine mission of Christ, when astonished at his doctrine, not only proceeded, at length, to charge him with being in compact with the Devil, but crucified him as a blasphemer.

mere show. Their hearts were never seriously engaged in any duty. They may, like the Pharisees, even disfigure their faces, that to others they may appear exceedingly devout. But still it is all a solemn farce. There is no truth in their appearances. Whence proceeds this conduct, but from the natural atheism of their hearts? The Apostle gives an account of some *who have a form of godliness, but deny the power thereof. All, who have nothing more than a form of godliness, do actually deny its power. As they practically deny, they show that they do not really believe with their hearts the reality of religion; because theirs consists in a mere form. And by denying the reality of religion, they materially deny the existence of God. For if a mere form be sufficient, then it cannot be God who is worshipped; for God is a spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth. Those who imagine that mere bodily service will be acceptable to him, deny him to be a spiritual being, and so deny him to be God. When he denounces a wo against his ancient people for their hypocrisy, he traces it up to their atheism. Wherefore the Lord said, Forasmuch as this people draw near me with their mouth, and with their lips do honour me, but have removed their heart far from me, and their fear towards me is taught by the precept of men: therefore, behold, I will proceed to do a marvellous work, &c. Then it follows,—Wo unto them that seek deep to hide their counsel from the Lord, and their works are in the dark, and they say, Who seeth us? and who knoweth us †? He considers this as the very language of atheism, Who seeth us? and who knoweth us? and surely with the greatest justice. For men would never presume to offer such an affront to God if they really considered him as their present witness, and as their future judge. The strict observation that God takes of the whole of our conduct, the certainty of a future judgment, and the awful discovery that will then be made of the secrets of the heart, heart, are the arguments used by Christ in dissuading his disciples from imitating the wicked example of the Pharisees in their hypocritical conduct. Beware ye of the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy. For there is nothing covered, that shall not be revealed; neither hid, that shall not be known. Therefore, whatsoever ye have spoken in darkness, shall be heard in the light *. Our Lord reckoned this exhortation of such importance to his disciples, both for time and eternity, that as the introduction of a most memorable discourse, and at a very remarkable time, when there was an innumerable multitude of people gathered together, insomuch that they trode one upon another, the greatest part of whom he doubtless knew to be actuated by unworthy motives, he particularly addressed these words to the twelve: He began to say to his disciples, first of all, beware ye of the leaven of the Pharisees. As this corrupt leaven is mournfully diffused through the hearts of believers themselves, it calls for their peculiar attention to that natural atheism, which still dwells in them, and which is the source of the other. It is for want of a due impression of the being of God on their minds, that with respect to formality and hypocrisy in religious duties, they have so much reason to complain that their hearts are like a bow that shooteth deceitfully. But in this respect there is a great difference between real Christians and hypocrites. All the services of the latter are performed under the influence of an hypocritical spirit: but with Christians this principle prevails only in part; and in as far as it prevails, it is their habitual burden.

* 2 Tim. iii. 5.

† Isaiah xxix. 13, 14, 15.

3. THIS corruption of the heart breaks out in the profanity and sensuality of the life. The whole labour of many is merely to gratify their sensual appetites. Carnal pleasure is their highest aim. They travail with iniquity of every kind, they wallow in every species of debauchery; paying no more regard to their immortal souls than if they were as vile as their perishing bodies; nay, far more vile than them. For they treat the soul as if it had been given them

for

* Luke xii. 1—3.

was turned to be their enemy; and he is not an inactive enemy; for he fought against them*. Thus he often did with the Israelites. With many of them God was not well pleased; for they were overthrown in the wilderness. The book of Judges contains many examples of Divine correction, after they were brought into the land of promise. The sea overwhelmed Pharaoh and his host, after resisting all convictions, and all the awful warnings received from God, in ten grievous plagues succeeding one another. Vengeance pursued that wicked prophet Balaam, who acted not only against his conscience, but against the miraculous warning of his dumb ass, in doing all in his power to curse Israel, and afterwards enticing them to sin, that God might curse them. Although he wished to die the death of the righteous, he had his end with them who are thrust through with a sword, that go down to the stones of the pit, as a carcase trodden under foot. When the Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul, all went wrong with him, and continued to do so, till at length he was defeated by the Philistines, and became his own executioner. Pilate suppressed and resisted the dictates of conscience in condemning Christ, while persuaded of his innocence, lest it should be concluded that he was not Cæsar's friend. But that which he so greatly feared came upon him, in the just retribution of Providence. For we learn from historical accounts generally credited, that he soon after lost the love of his master, and was banished to France, where, because of the misery of his situation, like Saul, he fell on his own sword.

7. God gives them up to their own lusts. He imposes restraints on the most wicked. This is absolutely necessary, for the preservation, not only of order in society, but of the very being of society. When men still continue like bullocks unaccustomed to the yoke, and when full of the fury of the Lord, and of the rebuke of our God, are only like a wild bull in a net; the Lord sometimes takes off all restraints in sin. My people would not hearken to my voice voice—therefore, I gave them up to their own heart's lusts. A man needs no other devil to possess him than these. The name of such a possession is Legion. Thus he becomes exceeding fierce in sin, and hurries on headlong to destruction, as if it advanced of itself, with too slow a pace. Pharaoh thought he was on the very point of accomplishing the ruin of Israel, when he said; I will pursue, I will overtake, I will divide the spoil, my lust shall be satisfied upon them: while God was only pursuing him, and about to satisfy his offended Justice upon him. Sennacherib was made to flee to his own country, after blaspheming the God of Israel, and losing his army by a supernatural destruction, that he might receive his death from the hands of his sons. If the house hath once been empty, swept and garnished, by means of convictions and external reformation, and afterwards the unclean spirit gets access, he is sure to bring with him seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and the last state of that man is worse than the first *.

* Isa. lxiii. 10.

8. In judgment he may lay occasions of sin in their way. God can tempt no man. He forces no man to sin, because he infinitely hates it. But when he sees sinners determined on iniquity, he sometimes chooses their delusions, as he threatens in his word: I also will choose their delusions, and will bring their fears upon them. The reason assigned is their resistance of his calls, and of their own convictions;—because when I called, none did answer; when I spake, they did not hear; but they did evil before mine eyes, and chose that in which I delighted not †. So the Apostle Paul declares; Because they received not the love of the truth—God shall send them strong delusions, that they should believe a lie †. It is elsewhere said; Because Ephraim hath made many altars to sin, altars shall be unto him to sin §. These occasions of sin are sometimes called stumbling-blocks. I will lay stumbling-blocks before this people, and the father and the son

VOL. I.

M m

shall

* Matt. xii. 43.—45.

† Isa. lxvi. 4.

‡ 2 Thess. ii. 10. 11.

§ Hof. viii. 11.

shall fall upon them; the neighbour and his friend shall perish *.

9. God may judicially harden their hearts. It is one of the inconceivable mysteries of Divine operation, that God should in righteous judgment give up a sinner to obduracy, and yet be at an infinite distance from the sin. But so it is. For the emphatic expressions used on this subject, cannot be restricted to so bare unoperative permission. He seems especially to accomplish this awful work by the means already mentioned, by giving them up to the government of their own lusts; by laying occasions of sin in their way, before which he knows they will fall, although herein they act according to the natural propensity of their hearts; and by delivering them up to the uncontrolled agency of Satan, as a tempter. The Lord hardened the heart of Pharaoh. Yea, the scripture saith unto Pharaoh, Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might shew my power in thee. What is the Apostle's inference? Therefore, Whom he will he hardeneth †. It is said of the Gentiles, that because they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, therefore God gave them over to a reprobate mind ‡. It is declared of the Canaanites, that it was of the Lord to harden their hearts, that they should come against Israel in battle, that he might destroy them utterly, and that they might have no favour, but that he might destroy them, as the Lord commanded Moses §. Sinners, in this deplorable situation, are in a manner delivered up to Satan's management. The God of this world blinds their minds. So it is said, that the Devil entered into Judas. We must not understand this of a literal possession, but of his being given up to his own lusts, under the fearful influence of Satan's temptations.

10. God may refuse to bear, although they should call. He laughs at the sinner, when trying to break his bands. But his holy scorn will be far more awful in the end: Because I called, and ye refused; therefore,

* Jer. vi. 21. † Rom. ix. 17, 18. ‡ Rom. i. 28.

§ Jos. xi. 20.

fore, will I also laugh at your calamity, and mock when your fear cometh*.

II. RESISTANCE of convictions sometimes ends in despair. We have already seen that this was Saul's case. Judas also, although he resisted the different warnings given by his Master, was afterwards affected with such horror of conscience, that he hanged himself.

12. THESE abused convictions will, if mercy prevent not, greatly aggravate their eternal condemnation and misery. Sinners, you may now smother conscience, like a spark among ashes; but this is only reserving it as a kindling to that fire, that shall never be quenched. You may, in the mean time, trample this worm under foot, or bury it in the earth of your worldly cares; but it shall never die. You may hatch cockatrice eggs, but you shall die by eating of them; and that which is crushed, breaketh out into a viper. The law worketh wrath. The sinner may refuse to hear its voice as a schoolmaster, when denouncing the sentence of condemnation, and to flee from the wrath to come. But he does not really escape it. He only treasures up wrath against the day of wrath. Stifled convictions shall be the great torment of the damned in hell. There, every conscience shall be fully awakened. A despised Gospel will be the most dreadful fuel of that lake that burneth for ever and ever. Such sinners will God consume like briers and thorns. It is the great aggravation of their misery that they look upon him whom they have pierced. For they look only to wail because of him. A pierced Christ, in the rejection of his Gospel, and resistance of his Spirit, beats the furnace of hell seven times more. The wrath of the Lamb is represented as the bitterest ingredient in the cup of fury, ministered to unbelievers:—Cover us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb. For the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand? But kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way.

S E R-

* Prov. i. 24.—31.

S E R M O N XV.

ON THE DECEITFULNESS OF THE HEART, IN EM-BRACING FALSE GROUNDS OF CONFIDENCE.

ISAIAH xliiv. 20.

He feedeth of ashes; a deceived heart hath turned him aside, that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say Is there not a lie in my right hand?

THERE is a kind of religion, alas! too generally crept in among professed Protestants, which has no relation to the heart. It entirely overlooks the necessity of a new nature, reduces regeneration to a mere name, or at least renders it a thing impossible, by making it to depend on the will of one who is led captive by the devil at his will. It confines obedience to the letter of the law, and draws a veil over its spirituality and extent; as the Pharisees did, who thought that the law was fulfilled, if the mere letter of it was not transgressed. It knows nothing of the blessedness of purity in heart, without which we cannot see God. Not only does it pay little regard to regeneration as the source of all acceptable worship, and to inward holiness as an essential ingredient in it; but it also despises the latter in the relation of an illustrious end appointed by God. For this is the will of God, even our sanctification. According to this Pharisaical system, he is fully entitled to the character of a good or virtuous man, who does not positively transgress the literal precept.

Nor

Nor will it greatly detract from his character, though he use considerable freedom with the first table of the law, if he preserve an external respect to the second. If he seem to love his neighbour, he may easily obtain a dispensation from loving the Lord with all his heart. But as it is declared in the Word that the heart is deceitful above all things, we can scarcely find a greater confirmation of it than this; that many in our time, both teachers and taught, satisfy themselves with a species of religion from which the heart is excluded. They profess to worship God the Spirit; but if it be not in spirit, it cannot be in truth.

THESE words are a part of that long and beautiful expostulation that God hath with his people, in this and the three preceding chapters, on the subject of idolatry; in consequence of that striking challenge given in chap. xli. 21. not merely to the worshippers of false gods, but to these gods themselves. But as whatever was written aforesaid, was written for our learning, as every thing is to us a false deity, which receives that place in the heart that belongs only to the true God, and which we embrace as our confidence; they describe the character and situation of all who reject the true salvation, and trust in any lying refuge. In these words we have an account of the conduct of the false worshipper, the cause of this conduct, and the effect proceeding from this cause. His conduct is metaphorically represented under the notion of feeding; because, as food is the support of the body, whatever a man confides in for eternity is to him the support of his soul. But strange is the food here mentioned. To what the allusion is made, we cannot pretend to determine. Some think, it refers to the custom of penitents under the law, in covering their heads with ashes, or lying among them, in which sense it is used, Psal. cii. 9. I have eaten ashes like bread. In this view it expresses the sorry and bitter fruits of idolatry. Probably, there may be a reference to the words immediately preceding. As in verse 19.

the

the idolater is described as burning part of the tree, of which he makes his idol, as baking bread and roasting flesh with the coals of it; perhaps the Spirit of God means to represent his folly in such a contemptible point of view, as if he mistook the ashes of his fire for the food prepared on it, and ate the one instead of the other. Or, the words may be designed to signify the shocking stupidity of considering that as a god, a part of which he hath himself already reduced to ashes. At any rate, the expression points out a food that is entirely unsuitable to nature, and denotes that a false ground of confidence is as unfit for the soul, as ashes would be for food to the body. In much the same sense it is said, Hof. xii. 1. Ephraim feedeth on wind. The cause of this strange propensity and foolish conduct is next assigned. A deceived heart hath turned him aside. This dreadful infatuation proceeds from a heart under the power of deceit. And so efficacious is it, that he cannot deliver his soul. The corruption of his heart increases the blindness of his understanding, and makes it a moral impossibility for him to shake himself loose from his vanities:—Nor say, Is there not a lie in my right hand? “Is it not a thing of nought in which I place my confidence, and which I grasp as eagerly as if it were my all?” Or, it may be read, at my right hand, referring to this as the place of power and dignity.

HAVING formerly considered some of the plans of deceit, which the heart pursues for stifling convictions altogether; it is our present design to point out some of those false grounds of hope for eternity, in embracing which it issues convictions:

BUT previously, we may observe more generally,

1. THAT the heart discovers its deceitfulness by its strong propensity to receive any error more readily than truth. That character of Antichrist is impressed on the heart of every man by nature;—its working is with all deceivableness of unrighteousness. That there is no error too gross for the heart of man to receive, if

if he be left to the power of his own corruption, is evident not only from the innumerable delusions of those who have no other guide than the light of nature, but especially, from the unspeakable variety of errors and multitude of heresies, many of which are of the most shocking nature, that have been adopted by men who have professed the Christian religion, and pretended to receive the word of God as their only standard. Hell itself could not have been more productive of errors and blasphemies, than the human heart hath been. These are the empoisoned streams that have been issuing from it, in every age of the world, and in every period of the Church. And although the multiplicity of its deceits has almost been expended in so long a course of ages, so that many heresies, which are published as new, are only a revival of those that have been long since antiquated; yet the deceitfulness of the heart, aided by Satan, exerts itself in ushering these into the world, dressed up in a new attire, suited to the taste of the age in which they are produced, and disguised with some greater semblance of truth; like the old and wrinkled Jezebel, who, when she heard of the coming of Jehu, painted her face, and tired her head, thinking to soften, if not to captivate the heart of this novice in royalty. It is easier to believe error than truth, because it is agreeable to the deceitfulness of the heart; whereas truth is repugnant to its natural inclination. Every man may be said to be born an heretic; for the seeds of depravity in his heart always dispose him to credit the testimony of Satan rather than that of God. Therefore heresies are mentioned among the works of the flesh, because they spring from inward corruption. Some lust, remaining unmortified in the heart, is generally the parent of error in the head. When men cannot endure sound doctrine, but heap to themselves teachers; it is generally after, i. e. according to their own lusts *. Even those who have received a religious education, who, from their

* 2 Tim. iv. 3.

their childhood, have been trained up in the wholesome words of sound doctrine, if their hearts be unaffected by the power of grace, will find a greater propensity to receive error, than to retain the truth in which they have been instructed. The very children of God, who have had the teaching of the Spirit, experience so great deceitfulness of heart, that they are often in danger of questioning the truth, of staggering at the testimony of God, and of apprehending that there is a greater plausibility in error, than in the doctrines of revelation; and were it not for the support of that same Spirit, who hath at first savingly enlightened them, their deceitfulness would carry them so far, and hurry them on so fast, that they would soon concerning the faith make shipwreck. So great a propensity is there in the human heart to deceit, that even those, who are in some measure established in the faith, after reasoning on any particular doctrine with adversaries, will at times find somewhat of the fatal influence of error. So keen, so insinuating a poison is this, that the very touch of it is noxious, though it be not tasted. What is fabled of the cockatrice is realized here. This brood of the old Serpent not only conveys fascination, but poison, by a look. Though the arguments, which are urged in defence of any error, be so weak as to bring no conviction to the understanding, yet they will sometimes be so effectual as to leave a dangerous sediment in the heart. Here they make an impression, which truth attended by all the force of the most cogent reasoning, often fails to make. And the reason is obvious. The bowels of the old man still yearn on his own kindred.

It is a striking evidence of this inward deceitfulness, that we seldom see a person recovered from error, especially if he has once received the truth and forsaken it: and we as seldom perceive one, who renounces the true faith, stop short at the first error which he embraces. The belief of one error makes way for another, and generally for one grosser than the

the

the former. For the farther that men decline from the true foundation, the structure they raise becomes the more hideous, and more immediately threatens the foolish builders with ruin. When men from the malignity of their hearts reject the truth, and against their own convictions propagate error; they are not only successful in deceiving others, but have a miserable success in deceiving themselves into the belief of those damnable doctrines, which at first they received, not so much because they believed them, as because they hated the truth. Hence, it is that error acquires all that deceivableness of unrighteousness attributed to the Man of Sin. Men receive not the love of the truth *. What a person wishes to believe, if contrary to the rule of faith, he will, more easily than could be imagined, persuade himself to believe; because it suits the deceitfulness of his heart, and its fixed opposition to God: and this, notwithstanding the powerful influence of education, the convictions of conscience, and the ordinary operations of the Spirit. Those also, who are assiduous in perverting others, when scarcely confirmed in their own delusions, or when they have not as yet declined far from the truth; by their false zeal, generally not only strengthen their own apostasy, but greatly extend it. Thus the Scripture is fulfilled: Evil men and seducers wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived †. Does not this illustrate the necessity of still praying, that we may be enabled to renounce the hidden things of dishonesty, and preserved from walking in craftiness, or handling the word of God deceitfully; and that we may not be as many, who corrupt the word of God, but as of sincerity, as of God, that in the sight of God, we may speak in Christ ‡?

2. THE heart discovers this deceitfulness by its extreme reluctance to the only way of salvation, and by its violent propensity to every lying refuge. We have already considered its attachment to error, doctrinally, its inclination to prefer error to truth; and we may now

VOL. I.

N n

* 2 Thess. ii. 10.

† 2 Tim. iii. 13.

‡ 2 Cor. iv. 2. ii. 17.

now attend to this principle as discovered by its attachment to error, in a practical respect. As we have seen the effects of this deceitfulness on the understanding, we may also view its fatal influence on the will. Notwithstanding all the commands and calls of God in the word, to believe in Christ; the earnest expostulations and tender intreaties, that God condescends to use with sinners on this head; the awful threatenings denounced against those who reject the Son of God; the inward convictions that the sinner may have, at times, of the insufficiency of every other foundation of confidence; yet he resolutely leans on his broken reed. So averse is his heart from God's method of salvation, although far more comfortable than obedience to a broken, cursing Law, or toilsome endeavours to attain holiness without a new nature; that he will rather weary himself in the greatness of his way; and labour in the fire for very vanity, than accept of the Divine counsel. Many things may incline him to suspect the security of his situation. But he will rather boldly deceit, than put the matter to an impartial trial, or put it out of doubt by listening to him that speaketh from heaven. Conscience, when deeply wounded, can find no healing from any of his false hopes. But he will rather lull it asleep, at the tremendous risk of its awakening in hell, than make use of the balm of Gilead, or apply to the omnipotent Physician there. So violent is his opposition to the loving Redeemer, and so vehement is his love to his own devices, that nothing but an exceeding greatness of power can deliver him. He must be brought from every false sanctuary, and find every treacherous hiding place overwhelmed by the storm of Justice, before he be willing to resign them. When driven from one refuge of lies, he flies to another, and goes on in this course, till by the operation of the Spirit of bondage, he be *shut up unto the faith, like a madman, as the metaphor implies, who is confined by his merciful friends from accomplishing his own own ruin, on which he is resolutely bent; or, like a prisoner in a strong hold, under the condemnatory sentence of the law *. In this situation he continues, till the year of God's redeemed be come, when liberty is proclaimed to the captive by the Spirit of adoption, and the rebel is made willing in the day of power.

* Gal. iii. 23.

MORE particularly we observe,

1. THAT multitudes betake themselves to the general mercy of God. Perhaps this is the first lying refuge to which the deceitful heart flies for shelter, when conscience is alarmed. "I am a sinner indeed," saith the heart, "this I cannot deny: but God hath no pleasure in the death of the wicked, for he is a merciful God, and he never made any of his creatures to damn them." But, alas! this is a treacherous hiding place. God made man upright, but he hath sought out many inventions. If any of mankind be damned, the blame lies on themselves. For they are all without excuse. This is especially the case with the hearers of the gospel. They are damned, because they will not be saved. They perish, because they despise the remedy. They inherit eternal death, because they judge themselves unworthy of everlasting life, because they will not come to Christ, that they may have it. God indeed is merciful. But his mercy must be viewed in a twofold light, both with respect to its nature and its operation. As to its nature, it is an essential perfection of God. Unto thee, O Lord, belongeth mercy. The object of our worship could not be God, unless he were infinitely merciful. But it must also be remembered, that mercy is entirely free in all its operations. It hath the absolute choice of its egress, of its objects, and of the manner of its manifestation. He will have mercy on whom he will have mercy †. God was under no necessity of nature to shew mercy to any of the ruined family of Adam, more than to the angels, who kept not their first estate. It is a sovereign act of his will, a free purpose of grace. Sinners, you err egregiously, egregiously, if you apprehend that God cannot but have mercy on sinful miserable creatures. God cannot deny himself. He will never glorify his mercy at the expence of his justice, which is as much an essential perfection of his nature as the former. You altogether confound the attributes of God in your darkened understandings. You make the operation of mercy a necessary act with God, but that of justice arbitrary. You suppose him to be under a necessity of displaying his mercy, but under none with respect to justice. Now, the very contrary is the truth. He acts necessarily in the exercise of Justice, but sovereignly in that of Mercy. He cannot but punish sin, because he cannot but hate it, according to his immutable holiness. And the punishment of sin is just God's operative hatred of it. In the exercise of justice, he looks to the desert of sin. In that of mercy, he can have no such respect; because misery can never have the smallest portion of merit. Can you imagine that God will ever sacrifice an essential perfection of his nature to gratify rebellious worms, who despise the riches of his mercy? No. While he proclaims himself to be the Lord God, merciful and gracious, he at the same time assures us, that he will by no means clear the guilty *. He will not be merciful to any wicked transgressor †.

* Gal. iii. 23. † Rom. ix. 15.

WHAT a lying refuge must this be, since it is uncovenanted mercy that you trust in. There is not one promise in the word, which can afford any prospect of mercy, without respect to the everlasting covenant. All the mercy of God to sinners runs in this channel. Therefore these two are joined together. He is the faithful God who keepeth covenant and mercy, that is covenanted mercy ‡. The covenant of my peace shall not be removed, saith the Lord, that hath mercy on thee §. It is mercy confirmed by an oath; The Lord thy God shall keep the covenant and the mercy, which he sware unto thy fathers ||. All the blessings of

* Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7. † Psal. lix. 5. ‡ Deut. vii. 9.

§ Isa. liv. 10. || Deut. vii. 12.

of the covenant are purchased and confirmed by the blood of Christ, and communicated to him, that he may dispense them to us. Therefore, they are sure mercies, because not only established by an everlasting covenant, but as being *the mercies of David. But if the general mercy of God be a sufficient ground of confidence, wherein consists the superior blessedness of those who know the joyful sound? What necessity was there for the gospel? Wherein are we better than the heathen, who never heard of it? Doth God manifest his mercy out of Christ? Then Christ died in vain. This plan pours the greatest dishonour on the whole work of Redemption, in its contrivance, in its purchase, and in its application. What need for such infinite expence in the display of mercy, if God must necessarily pardon sin? But indeed, there is no mercy with God out of Christ. For our God is a consuming fire, who, if the briers and thorns be set against him in battle, will pass through them, and burn them up together. God keepeth his faithfulness and his mercy only with him †. It is only in the person and mediation of Jesus, that mercy and truth have met together ‡. With the Lord there is mercy, only because with him there is forgiveness, or a propitiation §. Our only hope is in looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life ||. Nay, Christ himself is the mercy promised unto the fathers . For all other mercies are summed up and concentrated in him, and to be enjoyed only in union to him. He is the unspeakable gift of God. We not only have eternal life through him, but we have it in him. For this is the true God and eternal life. But with respect to all who have no understanding, who reject this promised mercy, this covenanted mercy, who despise their own mercies, there is nothing but a fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, to devour the adversary; for he that made them will not have mercy upon them, and he that formed them will shew them no favour ††.

2. THE

* If. lv. 4. † Ps. lxxxix. 24. ‡ Ps. lxxxv. 10.

§ Ps. cxxx. 4. 7. || Jude ver. 21.  Luke i. 72. †† If. xxvii. 21.

2. THE heart often disposes one to look into itself for something good. Many take this course, for a foundation of tranquillity, when any storm is raised in conscience. Perhaps they cannot deny the reasonableness of its alarms about their open outward sins: but they fly to the heart. They boast of its purity. This was the case with the Church of Laodicea: Thou thinkest that thou art rich, and increased with goods, and standing in need of nothing. They apprehend, it may be, that they have a considerable portion of knowledge in the things of God, because they can repeat whole chapters of the Bible; although their learning be like that of a silly bird, which prattles what it does not understand. They pretend an ardent inclination to good, however much they may err at times. Although they commit gross sins, they will not allow them to be evidences of wickedness; because this contains an aspersion on their hearts. These are only evidences of weakness. They have been overcome by temptation, while their hearts wished to act a very different part. They adopt the language of Abimelech, at least in part. If they cannot say, In the innocency of my hands, they will boldly declare,—in the integrity of my heart have I done this. Therefore, they persuade themselves that God will excuse them, because they desire to do better, however often they fail. But these things, instead of proving that they love God, as they pretend; on the contrary, demonstrate that they are lovers of their own selves, which is a striking evidence of rebellion against him.

3. OTHERS found their hope on resolutions of reformation. They enter into these, when the arrows of the Almighty are within them, either under Word or Providence. They resolve to do better than they have formerly done, to become new creatures, to resist their most beloved iniquities. This is especially the case under afflictions. When God's hand lies heavy upon them, they try to soothe him into compassion. They flatter him with their lips, promising mising an entire change of life, while their hearts are far from him. They may, indeed, think themselves sincere. But their sincerity is that of a heart under the dominion of deceit. Their love to sin is still supreme. They seem to love God; but it is only from their dislike to suffering. This conduct we find exemplified by the wicked Pharaoh*.—After the plague of the hail, he called for Moses and Aaron, and said unto them; I have sinned this time; the Lord is righteous, and I and my people are wicked. Intreat the Lord, that there be no more mighty thunders and hail; and I will let you go, and ye shall stay no longer. How vain these promises and resolutions are, the event generally proves, as it did in his case. When Pharaoh saw that the rain and the hail, and the thunders were ceased, he sinned yet more, and hardened his heart—neither would he let the children of Israel go †. Perhaps, to bind themselves the stronger, they may give their resolutions the solemnity of vows. They may enter into the most solemn engagements before the all-seeing God. But their goodness is as the morning cloud, and as the early dew. When sin within them begins to stir, or temptation from without, these strong bonds are as tow, and the maker of them as a spark, and they both burn together. Nor is it surprising that they should be of so little avail; because they are made by persons under the dominion of sin, ignorant of the sinfulness and impotency of their situation, and in a dependence on their own strength, without any right sense of the necessity of a new heart, of faith in the blood of Christ for justification, or of the communication of new covenant strength from his Mediatorial fulness.

4. PARTIAL and outward reformation is the confidence of many. Under convictions they proceed so far, as to make some change in their conversation, although they have never been the subjects of a change in the heart. They escape the grosser pollutions that are in the world, through the knowledge of the Lord

* Exod. ix. 27, 28. † Ver. 34, 35.

Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. That they may get rid of the severe admonitions of conscience, they abandon the external commission of some sins. But the love of all sin is as strong as ever. Sin only takes a new channel. Like a river that disappears, it runs more under ground. Ahab, after the Prophet had reproved him, and denounced judgment against his house, not only lay in sackcloth, but walked softly. In like manner, Herod feared John, knowing that he was a just man and an holy, and observed him, and when he heard him, he did many things, and he heard him gladly *. Here we find several circumstances materially good; an esteem for God's messenger, in opposition to that avowed contempt, that is often poured upon his servants by the wicked, he was convinced that he was a just man and an holy; a veneration for his person and character, he feared John; a concern about his safety, for he observed, or rather he preserved him †;— an

* Mark vi. 20.

† That this is the proper meaning of the word rendered in our version observed, is evident from the constant use of it in this sense in other places, as Matt. ix. 17. Luke ii. 19.; v. 38. It cannot with propriety be alleged that this is not the true sense, because it is added that he heard him, which we have no reason to suppose he did, after being rebuked by him: for this expression clearly refers to the past, and not to what succeeded his keeping him. Therefore, it is properly translated, when he heard him. The Evangelist, according to the manner most ordinarily observed in the gospel history, without regard to the order of time, takes occasion here to mention Herod's former conduct, before John had given offence. Nor is it any objection to the sense of the word, that Herod himself had sent forth, and laid hold upon John, and bound him in prison for Herodias' sake, as we learn from ver. 17. For although Herod might be highly displeas'd at him, yet it is undeniable that he did not wish to go so far as Herodias; for when she would have killed him, she could not, ver. 19. Nay, these words are introduced as the very reason why she could not effect her bloody purpose; For he feared John, and preserved him. Although he did not reckon it consistent, either with his own honour, or with that of Herodias, whom he had married, ver. 17. to suffer John to preach before him any more, or even to let him at liberty: yet he wished to preserve his life. It is indeed said, Matt. xiv. 5. that when he would have put him to death, he feared the multitude, be- cause

an attendance on ordinances, instead of that neglect with which many treat them, or the foolish inconsideration and indifference of the greatest part, he heard him; some warmth of affections under the word, like that of the stony-ground-hearers, he heard him gladly; a partial reformation, for he not only heard, but did; and a reformation of some considerable extent, he did many things. But still his heart remained the same. For this very Herod afterwards beheaded his faithful preacher. His conscience seems to have been first awakened by John's ministry, and afterwards pacified by a partial reformation. But when the Baptist's addresses became more close and particular, when he reproved him explicitly for incestuous adultery, Herod could not suffer it. Therefore he cast him into prison. He would be willing to do many things, if he might still keep his brother Philip's wife. He would deny himself some pleasures, and mortify himself by some duties, if his darling sin might be spared. But when John plainly tells him; It is not lawful for thee to have her, when, like Lot in Sodom, he will needs be a judge, when he presumes to define law to a sovereign; he renounces his uncourtly chaplain, who had neither a garb*, nor a manner, nor a conscience fit for kings houses, and his partial reformation together.

5. MANY confide in a bare profession of religion and observation of the form of duties. We have already spoken of that discovery which is given of the deceitfulness of the heart, when persons adopt and maintain a

VOL. I.

O o

* Matt. xi. 8.

cause they counted him as a prophet. But we are either to consider this inclination as the immediate effect of his wrath, when recently reproved, which might afterwards subside, or be overpowered by his conviction of the Baptist's integrity, and by his remaining veneration for his character; or we must conclude, that he continued to preserve him from the same political motive which at first got the better of his bloody inclination, his fear of the multitude. For even after his oath to the daughter of Herodias, to give her whatsoever she would ask, he was exceeding sorry, when she demanded the head of John, Mark vi. 26.

a profession of religion hypocritically, with a real intention to impose on others*. We now speak of those who delude themselves, by supposing that they are in a fair way to heaven, because they have a name to live, and a form of godliness. This is a species of hypocrisy, different from that formerly mentioned, according to the common acceptation of the word; which, although in Scripture used promiscuously in both senses, yet with greater strictness and propriety, applies to him who intentionally deceives others, while he knows his own guile. For the word hypocrite denotes one who knowingly plays a false part. For the sake of distinction, the other kind of hypocrite, who deludes himself, may be called a self-deceiver. And indeed, it is a great degree of self-deceit for a man to flatter himself, that his interests are entirely secure, merely because he has a profession of religion, and goes the outward round of duties. The great abounding of such self-deceivers in the Church, may, alas! be too well known from the unprofitableness of their conversation. How unexceptionable soever their external conduct may be, as to positive transgression; yet there is a great want in it. Though their life be not defiled by gross enormities, it is by no means adorned by the fruits of holiness, by a fervour of godliness, by a labour of love. Such go no farther in religion, than is barely necessary to maintain their character as professors, and procure admission to the privileges of the Church. Though others may have great apprehensions in regard to them, yet they carry matters so fair, that they could not be justly excluded; as none may presume to determine the state of any to be bad, if they be not ignorant of the truth, or living in the habitual practice of known sin. In a word, they have externally all the negative side of a Christian. They are no fornicators, adulterers, drunkards, extortioners or profane persons. Their character is good; they are esteemed by their neighbours; they are regular in the performance of duties: and

* See Serm. xi.

and they conclude that it would be cruel and unjust to such favourable appearances for them to suspect themselves.

PERSONS of this stamp are described by the Spirit of God: This people draw near me with their mouth, and with their lips do honour me, but have removed their heart far from me *. Such self-deceivers are generally much puffed up with ideas of their own importance and superiority to others. Of such the wise Agur speaks: There is a generation that are pure in their own eyes, and yet are not washed from their filthiness †. God expresses his hatred of this self-righteous temper: They say, Stand by thyself, come not near to me, for I am holier than thou. These are a smoke in my nose, a fire that burneth all the day ‡. The same spirit Christ also reproved, when he spake the parable of the Pharisee and Publican to certain who trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others §. This self-deceit the Apostle James describes in a very striking manner while he earnestly cautions against it: But be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving yourselves . When our Lord illustrates the false foundations on which men may rest for salvation, he particularly mentions this as one. Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven ††. Satan who wishes to keep sinners as far from the kingdom as possible, if he cannot retain them in absolute profanity, if, in consequence of some convictions, they adopt a profession, will next try to persuade them to rest here. The heart often falls in with the deceit, because the transition from gross immorality to an outward appearance of seriousness is very considerable. Therefore there is great danger of relying on it. It is also far easier to make a profession, and to observe ordinances, than to deny one's self, believe in Christ, and mortify sin. The Jews found it easier to keep all

the

* Isa. xxix. 13. † Prov. xxx. 12. ‡ Isa. lxxv. 5

§ Luke xviii. 9.  Ch. i. 22. †† Mat. vii. 24.

the ceremonial institutions which God had appointed, and all the traditions which their fathers had super-added, than to stain the pride of their glory, by taking up the cross; because even that burdensome work was far less disagreeable to their corrupt hearts.—The more pure any profession is, the greater is the danger. When, on the one side, one has to encounter the prejudices of education against sound doctrine, to renounce open sins, and to perform a variety of duties unpleasent to corruption; and on the other, to sustain the reproach of the world, to separate from former acquaintance, and perhaps to suffer in temporal respects; these things seem, through the power of deceit, to afford some ground of confidence and boasting before God.

S E R M O N XVI.

ON THE DECEITFULNESS OF THE HEART, IN EMBRACING FALSE GROUNDS OF CONFIDENCE.

ISAIAH xliv. 20.

A deceived heart hath turned him aside, that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say, Is there not a lie in my right hand?

IN the preceding discourse, we have considered the deceitfulness of the heart as manifested in fixing on false grounds of confidence for terminating convictions.

victions. It hath been observed, that this principle is in general discovered by the strong propensity of the heart to embrace any error more readily than truth, by its extreme reluctance to the only way of salvation, and by its violent propensity to every lying refuge; more particularly, by confidence in the general mercy of God, by disposing a man to look into the heart itself for something good, by depending on resolutions of reformation, and by trusting to reformation of a partial and outward kind.

6. OTHERS deceive themselves into a reliance on their church-privileges. This was an ancient error of the Jews. When Jeremiah reprov'd them for their wicked works, they presumptuously replied, *The temple of the Lord, The temple of the Lord. They persuaded themselves, that it was impossible that God should reject a people, or any individuals of a people, which was so remarkably distinguished from the nations. Christ found them labouring under the same ruinous deceit. They saw not the necessity of repentance, or of fruits meet for it; because they had Abraham for their father †. For the same reason, they had no sense of their need of spiritual freedom, of deliverance from the bondage of corruption, from a death in trespasses and in sins. We be Abraham's seed, and were never in bondage to any man: how sayest thou then, Ye shall be made free? ‡. During the ministry of Paul, they were trusting to the same sandy foundation. Therefore in his epistle to the Romans, when proving Jews as well as Gentiles to be under sin, he sets aside that objection, which the Jews might offer from their outward privileges: Behold, thou art called a Jew, and restest in the law, and makest thy boast of God §. They rejoiced in their name as distinguishing them from blinded Gentiles. They rested in the enjoyment of the law, as committed to them, even while that very law condemn'd them. They rested in this, instead of coming to Christ, who is the end of the law for righteousness,

and

* Jer. vii. 4. † Mat. iii. 9. ‡ John viii. 33. § Rom. ii. 17.

and who alone can give rest to the soul. They boasted in their relation to God as his peculiar and covenant people. Paul himself was once enslaved by this deceit. He had confidence in the flesh; because he was circumcised the eighth day, of the stock of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin, one of the two tribes that adhered to the house of David, and to the worship of God, when the other ten revolted from both *; an Hebrew of the Hebrews, touching the law a Pharisee. These things were gain to him †. It is much to be feared, that many who are called Christians rest as much on things of the same nature as ever the Jews did. They have been baptised. They are admitted to the Lord's Supper. These are their circumcision on the eighth day, their new moons, and their solemn feasts. If this be not the case, why do many of you show so unreasonable an anxiety for baptism to your children; so that nothing will satisfy you, unless all decency and regularity be trampled on, for the more expeditious dispensation of the ordinance; as if the want of it would seal your children under condemnation, or the mere observation of it secure them in salvation? If you confide not in privileges, why are many of you so anxious to receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper once a year, and perhaps, at a particular time, without any desire of celebrating this ordinance more frequently; and so uneasy, if through disease, or by any other unfurmountable obstacle, you be prevented from receiving it at the usual time, or in the ordinary place? How are your minds so serene, after the performance of this duty, without any concern about your meetness for it, or exercise in it? Do not these things indicate, that you rather convert it into a Sacrifice, than receive it as a Sacrament; that you make that day rather a day of expiation, than of commemoration; that you think, with the Papists, that the ordinance confers grace from the work wrought; that you make a God of it, give it the room of the blood of Christ,

* 1 Kings xii. 21.

† Phil. iii. 4.—7.

Christ, and confide in it as an atonement for the sins of the foregoing year, and a sort of dispensation for those of the succeeding one?

BUT whatever you may do, God lays no stress on your privileges. Therefore by Jeremiah, he declared to those who trusted in them, that he would deal with them, as with the Heathen: *Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will punish all them who are circumcised with the uncircumcised: Egypt and Judah, and Edom, and the children of Ammon, and Moab, and all that are in the utmost corners, that dwell in the wilderness: for all these nations are uncircumcised, and all the house of Israel are uncircumcised in the heart. The Baptist told those in his time who trusted in their relation to Abraham, that God would rather work a miracle, by raising up spiritual children to Abraham from stones, than acknowledge these as his people, who although they had a natural relation to the Patriarch, had hard and stony hearts †. Christ also shews them, that their connection with Abraham as their natural father, did not preserve them from having the Devil as their spiritual father; because they did his works ‡. He assures them, that many shall say unto him, in the day of judgment, Lord, Lord, open to us—We have eaten and drunk in thy presence, and thou hast taught in our streets; to whom he shall say, I tell you, I know you not whence you are §. So Paul informs those who rested in the law, that if they were breakers of it, their circumcision was made uncircumcision.—*For he is not a Jew, who is one outwardly, neither is that circumcision, which is outward in the flesh. But he is a Jew, he is a Christian, who is one inwardly, and circumcision, call it baptism if you will, is that of the heart, in the spirit, not in the letter, whose praise is not of men but of God. These things that Paul once counted gain, after his conversion, he counted loss for Christ. Nay, your external privileges, instead of justifying you before

* Jer. ix. 25. 26.

† Mat. iii. 9.

‡ John viii. 34.—44.

§ Luke xiii. 24. 25.

 Rom. ii. 26.—29.

fore God, will only increase your condemnation, if you trust in them, and reject Christ the foundation laid in Zion. Although in respect of privilege, you may be exalted to heaven, yet your fall will only be the greater; for you shall be thrust down to hell.—It shall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah, in the day of judgment, than for you.

7. SOME confide in their gifts, or in their usefulness by means of them. Those who have formerly been ignorant of the principles of religion, and either by application, or by the common illumination of the Spirit, attain a considerable knowledge of these, are in danger of resting here. The danger is the greater, that knowledge, when un sanctified, puffeth up. We see how contemptibly the Pharisees speak of the common people; This people that knoweth not the law, is cursed. That this was one of the false confidences of the Jews, is evident from the peculiar notice that Paul takes of it, when enumerating those things on which they rested: Thou knowest his will, and approvest the things that are more excellent, being instructed out of the law *. Some may trust in their gifts of utterance in prayer or preaching; or, in their usefulness, either in converting or edifying others: as the Apostle adds; And art confident, that thou thyself, art a guide of the blind, a light of them who are in darkness, an instructor of the foolish, a teacher of babes, who hast the form of knowledge, and of the truth in the law †. But gifts of this kind are not confined to saints. They are bestowed for the advantage of others. And although, in general, it be the lips of the righteous that feed many; yet the common gifts of unholy persons may be useful. For Paul supposes it possible, that he might preach Christ to others, and be himself a castaway. Many, perhaps, do not speculatively, or in their judgments, rest on gifts, who yet do so practically. They find themselves possessed of these. They mistake them for grace, as it is not very easy to distinguish them, without without a considerable degree of spiritual discernment. Thus, they do not merely err so far as to rest on them as evidences of justification, but as, in some sense, the foundation of it. For the transition is very easy to the deceitful heart, from confidence in a false evidence, to confidence in a false foundation. And, perhaps, it will be found, that those who have no evidences of religion, but such as are counterfeit, generally transfer these into the room of the foundation: for what is put out of its own place in one respect, is readily misplaced in any other. Among the many false pretenders to an interest in him, Christ particularly mentions those, who rest on gifts and usefulness: I say unto you, many shall say in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name cast out devils, and in thy name done many wonderful works? to whom he shall say, *Depart from me, I never knew you, ye workers of iniquity. Here they declare the strength of their delusive hope, by the manner of their address. It is not only the language of fervency, but of great intimacy. They are introduced as speaking to the Judge, as men do to one, with whom they are thoroughly acquainted, although, at the time he may not seem to notice or recollect them; Lord, Lord,—“Thou canst be at no loss to know us. We have received many gifts from thee, and by means of them we have also done thee much service!” But he disclaims all knowledge of them, all love to them, all interest in them. He evidently insinuates also, that they might live and die in this self-deceit. For it is in that day, that they are convinced of their false confidence. Paul supposes that one might have all knowledge and all faith, and yet be as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal.

* Rom. ii. 18.

† ver. 19,—20.

8. SOME may trust to a work of the Law, as if it were in itself saving. The law may operate on conscience in a twofold manner, either as commanding, or as condemning; by a discovery either of duty or of danger. But in neither of these ways is it indi-

* Matt. vii. 22, 23.

spenſably connected with ſalvation. For there are many, really intereſted in Chriſt, who were never the ſubjects of a law-work. This is the caſe with thoſe, who have been united to him in a ſtate of infancy, before they were capable of knowing the operations of the Spirit on their hearts. So it was with Samuel, of whom it is ſaid, that the child was in favour with the Lord *; with Jeremiah, to whom he ſpeaks in this manner, Before I formed thee in the belly I knew thee, and before thou cameſt forth out of the womb I ſanctified thee †; and with John, the Forerunner of Chriſt, who was filled with the Holy Ghoſt, from his mother's womb ‡. Theſe perſons could not undergo a work of the law before union to Chriſt. There are others, who have been converted after they were come to years, in whom the operations of the Spirit have been ſo gradual, that they have ſcarcely been ſenſible of this law-work, or ſenſible of it in ſo ſmall a degree, that they have been afterwards in danger of doubting the reality of their faith, for this very reaſon. One of the thieves, who were crucified with Chriſt, was converted very ſuddenly; and it does not appear that there was a preparatory work of the Spirit. The convictions of thoſe who were turned to the Lord, by Peter's miniſtry, on the day of Pentecoſt, almoſt inſtantly terminated in converſion. Thoſe, whoſe experience correſponds to ſuch examples, have felt little or nothing of terrors, before they were brought into a ſtate of peace, compared with others who have been long in a moſt deplorable ſituation, almoſt driven to deſpair, ere they obtained a ſaving diſcovery of mercy, or who, as the Scripture expreſſes it, like Ephraim, have ſtaid long in the place of the breaking forth of children §.

ON the other hand, there may be ſome, who for a long time, may be the ſubjects of a law-work, and that with the greateſt ſeverity, who never undergo a ſaving change, but afterwards give the full'eſt evidence of their being in the gall of bitterneſs. Eſau found no place for repentance, although he ſought it carefully with tears. So severe were the terrors that the traitor felt, when convinced of his guilt in betraying innocent blood, that he would rather plunge himself into hell, than bear them any longer on earth. Here it is to be observed, lest any should mistake, that when we speak of some adult persons being the subjects of regeneration, without a discernible law-work, we are far from excluding it entirely. They do not, perhaps, experience any regular, continued, and severe working of the law on their consciences, like that of many others. But they must of necessity be convinced of their sinful and miserable situation by nature, of their absolute inability to deliver themselves, and of their liability to eternal destruction; before they can embrace Christ as their only refuge. Yet this law-work may be so gentle and gradual, or of so short a duration, as scarcely to deserve the name, and frequently to be almost imperceptible to themselves.
with

* 1 Sam. ii. 26. † Jer. i. 5. ‡ Luke i. 15. § Hoſ. xiii. 13.

BUT although it thus appears undeniably, that a regular, formal and continued work of the law on the conscience, is not indispensably connected with salvation, either on the one hand, as marring the evidences of salvation without it, or on the other, as ensuring the reality of a saving change; yet gospel-hearers may through the deceitfulness of their hearts, imagine that all is secure with them for eternity, because of their experience of a work of this nature. Those, who for a considerable part of their lives have been ignorant of the gospel of Christ, or gone on in an unrestrained course of iniquity, are most in danger of falling into this mistake; because the transition from a total indifference about the state of their souls, to some deep, anxious and distressful concern about it, is so great, that they are very apt to conclude they are the subjects of a saving operation of the Spirit. Because they have experienced a legal sorrow for sin, principally arising from the fear of wrath, they flatter themselves that they have felt that sorrow, which is of a godly sort; that repentance which is not to be repented of. They have been frightened out of their grosser grosser fins, therefore they presume that they have actually fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before them. They find some change of course; and they flatter themselves that they have undergone a real change of nature.

9. THIS principle of deceit is discovered by the sinner's endeavours to obtain justification by moral duties. While some depend on a strict observation of appointed ordinances, others go farther, in pretending to obey the whole law. They not only read and pray, and attend divine worship; but they attempt to keep all the commandments, for obtaining life. They being ignorant of God's righteousness, go about to establish a righteousness of their own; and thus they do not submit themselves to the righteousness of God. We have a very affecting instance of this species of self-deceit, and of the extreme danger of it, in the history of the young man, who applied to Christ, inquiring, *What good thing he should do to inherit eternal life? He comes to Christ, seeking salvation in a legal way; and Christ answers him according to his idols. If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments: "if thou art determined to be saved by thy own doings, then thou must observe the whole law." As he discovered his self-deceit, in supposing that it was possible for him to enter into life in this way; he gave a farther proof of it, in apprehending that he had anticipated the necessity of this injunction. Being ignorant of their spirituality and extent, he replied; All these things have I kept from my youth up. And he asks, as if with a secret triumph of heart; What lack I yet? "When I have already done so much for life, is there any thing that can yet be wanting?" Or, shall we rather suppose, from the modesty and gentleness of his behaviour, that in this inquiry he was influenced by the dictates of his natural conscience, which was not satisfied with all he had hitherto done? Whatever was the case, our Lord gives him one injunction, that fully displays the vanity

* Matt. xix. 16.—22.

vanity of all his pretensions and endeavours, and the fatal nature of his self-deceit. If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell all that thou hast, and give to the poor. He had formerly mentioned all the precepts of the second table, in so many words, save that regarding covetousness; and now he tries him on this precept. But whether this was touching him on the tender part, whether this had been his darling sin; as an evidence of the folly of his legal expectations, we are informed that he went away sorrowful, for he had great possessions. It appears, indeed, that he was naturally an amiable person. It is also said that Christ loved him, (i. e.) considered as man. Nay, it is evident, that he came to Christ, persuaded that he could teach him the way to eternal life. But notwithstanding these things in his favour, the deceitfulness of his heart carried him away from the good Master, and we have no account of his return. It shows the inconceivable deceitfulness of the heart, that so many are led astray by this deceit, when it is so gross and palpable. For what can be more absurd, than for fallen man to imagine that he can obey the law for life, a law already broken, a law that speaks no comfort to the sinner, that only denounces wrath and eternal condemnation against every soul of man that doth evil?

10. MANY trust to their sincerity in religion. Rather than renounce the multiplied subterfuges of legality, they will endeavour to compound with the law, as if they said to it; "Although we cannot give perfect obedience to thy precept, yet, upon condition of deliverance from thy penalty, and of being entitled to the blessing promised, we will make up for the want of perfection in our obedience by its sincerity; and, to amend the whole, wherein we are deficient, we will trust to the righteousness of Christ." This fond imagination of the heart slays its thousands and ten thousands of professed Protestants. Nor is it any recommendation to it, that it hath been regularly reduced into form as a doctrine, as if it contained the very essence of the Gospel, even by men whose hearts,
it

it is to be hoped, were better than their heads. In vain do you boast of your sincerity as the foundation of your pardon and acceptance with God. Know ye not that the holy law will remit nothing of its demands? It claims the uttermoſt farthing. He that offendeth in one point is guilty of all. The law as certainly condemns him, as if he had broken every precept. But in every thing we all offend. Mere intention will not ſatisfy it. There muſt be action. Therefore, while it reaches to the heart, all its precepts are expreſſed in immediate reference to the outward act. How can it be pleaſed with mere ſincerity, when it hath no knowledge of any one who is under it, but either as perfect, or as condemned by its curſe? For when man was made under the law, he was thus ſubjected as an innocent creature. If the laws of an earthly kingdom make no excuſe for a man, becauſe he has become guilty, but on the contrary, for this very reaſon, denounce their vengeance againſt him; how can it be ſuppoſed that the law of a God of infinite purity ſhould thus be trifled with? If you truſt to your ſincerity, you make it your righteouſneſs, and thus reject the righteouſneſs of Jeſus Chriſt. “Oh! no,” may you reply, “we truſt to his righteouſneſs, for it is this that ſupplies “all our defects.” Hath Chriſt then become a Saviour to you, only to make you as far as poſſible favourable to yourſelves? Muſt his robe of wrought gold, his garment of ſalvation be degraded and defiled by being joined to the filthy rags of your righteouſneſs? Muſt it be rent in pieces to patch up your tattered ſhreds, and make a covering of them? Vain is the attempt. The new cloth put into your old garment, inſtead of mending it, would only make the rent worſe. What fellowſhip hath righteouſneſs with unrighteouſneſs? Our Lord’s garment of ſalvation is like that which he wore, ſeamleſs. It cannot be parted. It muſt either be received wholly, or not at all. Were it poſſible that ſo much as one of your rags, a ſingle-work of yours, could be ſeen in it, the all-piercing cing eye of Justice would look through it, and discern all your defects. It is only by putting it on completely, that there can be no spot in you.

BUT what is this sincerity in which you make your boast before God? Do you not confide in it as the ground of your justification? If so, it must be the sincerity of a person who is not yet justified; that is, of one still under the curse of the law. And do you think that the just God will accept this? Where is that human law which will accept sincerity of repentance for any crime, as an atonement for the crime itself? It is vain to pretend, that you do not view it as an atonement for your sins. For if you believe, that your pardon proceeds in any respect on this ground, it must be your atonement, nay, your only atonement. For you thus make that your righteousness, which is one duty required in the law. And *if righteousness in the least degree come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain. Can there be any true sincerity in a heart that is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked? Can there be any in a heart, where sin is enthroned, where it reigns; in a heart divided between God and the world, between God and self, between Christ and Belial? Can that man be truly sincere, who is a stranger to saving faith, without which it is impossible to please God; who habitually neglects known duty; who does not as a new-born babe desire the sincere milk of the word, and become as a little child? Can there be any true sincerity in a heart that loves not our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity; that rejects JEHOVAH our righteousness, that in all things takes to itself the pre-eminence? Can that heart be right with God, that has self for its great principle, motive, object and end in all actions? Your very confidence in your sincerity is a certain evidence that it is not genuine. For curst be man that trusteth in man. The sincerity of the greatest saint that ever lived could not for a moment be the ground of his acceptance. For the greatest sincerity we can attain

in

* Gal. ii. 21.

in this world is defiled by a corrupt mixture of deceit. But all such evasions clearly manifest the truth of JEHOVAH'S declaration in the words of our text, concerning the idolater, which may justly be applied to the legalist: He feedeth of ashes; a deceived heart hath turned him aside, that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say, Is there not a lie in my right hand? Every legal worker is indeed an idolater. He worships his own doings. He sacrifices to his net, and burns incense to his drag.

II. ANOTHER false confidence, which many fly to, is the observance of superstitious rites. In some cases, conscience, when awakened, is far more easily satisfied than in others. Its aptness to take peace to itself may be in proportion to the degree of its distress, or correspondent to the circumstances of the person. When the conscience of an ignorant man is roused, it will find rest in the very same confidence, that one more enlightened is shaken out of, in consequence of inward trouble. The same person, in the course of gradual awakenings, may successively embrace a variety of false refuges, still advancing from one kind of deceit to another less obvious, as being more refined than the former. He, who claims merit to himself from obedience, when his conscience is greatly awakened, naturally imagines, through his own deceitfulness, that this obedience will be exceedingly meritorious, if he perform even more than what is commanded. Thus, superstition is the fruit of fear, cooperating with ignorance, and with a mistaken apprehension of pleasing God, in proportion to the difficulty of the sacrifice, and the voluntariness of the offerer. So great is the deceitfulness of man's heart, that he will rather be at any possible expence to pacify conscience, than improve the blood of sprinkling. To express the difficulty of those courses, to which men often betake themselves, for procuring a false peace to conscience, they are described under the notion of labouring in the fire. And why will men incur such trouble, expence and danger, when the salvation of God is brought so near? The principal reason is, that his plan of salvation is too humiliating to the pride of man. So powerful is the legal principle in the heart, that how much soever conscience may be wounded, if the heart be not broken; it will rather heal these wounds slightly, or bear the smart of them for life, than submit to wash in the fountain of blood. Yea, so proud is the heart, that men would not only be Saviours to themselves, by accomplishing the means of salvation; but Gods, in prescribing the nature of the work itself: and indeed they act so far consistently in usurping both these characters; for none can be a Saviour, but he who is a God. Therefore, they often think God's way too easy, and endeavour to devise one of their own: not to mention the natural folly of the understanding, which is ready to ensure one of success in any enterprise, in proportion to the difficulty attending it; as Naaman thought it impossible, that washing in water should cure him of an inveterate leprosy, and had nearly rejected the Divine prescription, because of its simplicity.
God

Thus, the poor Heathens imagined that the efficacy of their sacrifices, in expiating their sins, was in proportion to their expence. Therefore they proceeded to the dreadful extremity of offering human sacrifices. But this conduct was far less surprising in them, who had no vision, than in God's peculiar people to whom he had shewed what is good. When conscience was alarmed by denunciations of wrath, they proposed this strange question; Wherewith shall I come before the Lord, or bow myself before the High God?—Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousand rivers of oil?* Sinners will not disturb conscience, if it do not disturb them. We find no inquiries about the method of pardon, till God begins to plead with Israel, as he does in the preceding part of this chapter. But as soon as the arrows of conviction are fixed in the conscience, the sinner cries out, What shall I do to be saved?

VOL. I.

Q 9

When

* Mic. vi. 6, 7.

When God declares his controversy ; Israel exclaims, as one bewildered in the midst of danger ; Wherewithal shall I come ? The awakened, but unrenewed sinner, rather than embrace the Divine plan, will burst the bonds not only of interest, but even of blood and affection. Here there is a proposal of the most expensive sacrifice, that the human mind strongly actuated by a sense of guilt ever devised. Shall I give my first-born for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul ?—as if even the unrenewed conscience would so far give its testimony to the justice of the law, as to acknowledge that its natural language is, that the nature that hath sinned must satisfy ; as if it would seal the equity of the threatening, The soul that sinneth, it shall die. Or, shall we rather suppose that Satan, who has always dared to imitate, yea, to rival God, and who must have known that the seed of the woman was to have his heel bruised, that the true passover was to be sacrificed, first suggested it to men ; as wishing to have the appearance of the same honour given to him, that was really to be given to the Judge of all. Be this as it will ; he prevailed so far, that this dreadful impiety was not only transacted within his own kingdom among the heathen ; but even the beloved land was defiled by it. Therefore there is a peculiar propriety in the Prophet's mentioning this kind of expiation ; as, at this very time, not only Israel, but Judah was chargeable with so inhuman guilt. These sacrifices they offered in Tophet, or the valley of the son of Hinnom. Ahaz was one of the kings, during whose reign Micah prophesied ; and he was one of these barbarous worshippers*. Jeremiah also mentions it as one of the great sins both of Israel and Judah in his time †. But the merciful God proclaims his abhorrence of such abominable services. He declares that he never commanded them, neither came they into his heart.

SOMEWHAT in the same manner, do the blinded Papists, in our day, try to pacify a guilty conscience.

* 2 Kings xvi. 3.

† Jer. xxxii. 35.

science. They are taught to believe that they must be saved by the merit of good works. And what are these good works? Those are especially meritorious, which have most of will-worship in them; the vain repetition of prayers in an unknown tongue; the counting of beads; making the sign of the cross times innumerable; and cruel penances. If they fatigue their bodies by tedious pilgrimages to the tombs of pretended saints; if they pine them by fasting; or mangle them with the scourge; then, in their deluded apprehension, they can not only merit heaven for themselves, but communicate a portion of their merit to others, who will not be at so much trouble, if they can purchase it at an easier rate. Nay, may it not be feared, that some Protestants found their hopes of acceptance upon obedience to the commandments of men? They observe days and months, and times and years: and many, perhaps, satisfy conscience with these things, even, while they not only despise the sole foundation, but neglect the clearest precepts of the moral law, and thus make void the commandments of God by their traditions. But the Lord saith; Who hath required these things at your hands? Bring no more vain oblations unto me. We see how much he is wroth with professors for resting on such false grounds, from the peculiar energy with which he answers the question of these false worshippers by Micah; He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good. As if he had said; “O vain, “ foolish and ungrateful people, how can you propose so ridiculous a question;—a question which “ would seem to imply, that I had never called you “ to come to me before, that you had never received “ any revelation from me? How is it, that you are “ so ignorant of the meaning of all the ceremonies “ which I have enjoined, as to suppose that they “ are required for salvation; when the whole design of them is only to shadow forth that salvation “ contained in the promise of the Messiah? How can “ you ever imagine that there can be any proportion “ between.

“ between ceremonial rites, or even the most costly “ sacrifices of a finite nature, and the evil of sin?
 “ How can you act so absurdly, as to believe that “ I can accept of human sacrifices, when I have “ often told you, that such a thing never came into “ my heart? Do you think that a practice abhorrent “ to nature, can be agreeable to the God of nature?
 “ Instead of considering these inquiries, apparently “ so sincere and anxious, as evidences of ignorance, “ and of a cordial desire of instruction; I must “ view them all as vain and shallow pretences to “ cover your aversion from that method of salva“ tion which I have prescribed. Have I not al“ ready showed you that way which is good and ac“ ceptable to me, through the blood of the Lamb, “ typified in all the sacrifices of my appointment?
 “ Have I not already revealed Him, as the object of “ your faith, who by way of eminence and distinc“ tion may be called good, because of his infinite “ perfections and suitableness as a portion to the im“ mortal soul, as being God *;—Him, in whose Me“ diatory person and work the Divine goodness is “ so illustriously displayed;—Him, who deserves this “ appellation, because of his completeness as a Sa“ viour? Have I not held him up to you as the good.
 “ because he is the only food for the soul †, the bread “ of life; and as the essential good of the new cove“ nant, the sum and substance of it, in whom all its “ blessings are concentrated, and in union to whom “ all its blessings are to be enjoyed; yea, as the “ goodness of JEHOVAH ‡? And have I not also fully “ declared the extent of that obedience required, as “ the fruit of an interest in this good; that it must be “ of a moral nature, as including not only your duty “ to your neighbour, in acts of justice and mercy to“ wards him, but your duty to me, in spiritual wor“ ship, in humility of heart, and in holiness of con“ versation?”

FROM these observations we may learn that those who

* Matt. xix. 17. † Isa. lv. 2. ‡ Jer. xxxi. 12. Hos. iii. 5.

who embrace a false confidence are in the greatest danger from that awful curse denounced by the Spirit of God: Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm *. Although it were supposed, that the curse was originally confined to those who trusted in an arm of flesh, for deliverance from their enemies; this, instead of weakening our conclusion, would give it new strength. If God denounced so dreadful a curse against them, who sought a temporal salvation from an arm of flesh, far heavier must his curse lie on the head of those, who from the same quarter expect a spiritual and eternal salvation. Was he so angry with his people for rejecting him as a temporal deliverer? Who knoweth the power of his anger against those who reject him as a Saviour from sin and from the wrath to come? Were those subjected to a curse, who made haste to go down to Egypt? Surely, these must deserve to feel the effects of his indignation, in a greater degree, in proportion to the unspeakable value of eternal salvation above that which is merely temporal †. If you trust in man, if you embrace a false confidence; you not only

* Jer. xvii. 5.

† It is undeniable that this curse extends to all who trust in any thing in or about themselves, whether it respect their performances or privileges. For the term flesh is often used to signify any thing pertaining to the law, whether ceremonial or moral. In this sense saith the Apostle of the uncircumcision; What shall we say then, that Abraham our father, as pertaining to the flesh, hath found? Rom. iv. 1. In the verse immediately following he shows that by the flesh he meant the works of the law; For if Abraham was justified by works, he hath whereof to glory. Also, when describing true believers, he says; We are the circumcision which—have no confidence in the flesh, Phil. iii. 3. Lest any should think that this referred to the literal circumcision only, he repeats the expression once and again in the next verse, and in verse 5, 6. illustrates it in such a manner as to show that he uses it far more extensively. When speaking of that, concerning which any other man might think that he had whereof he might boast in the flesh, he not only mentions the privileges of his birth, and his being circumcised; but his connection with the strictest sect among the Jews, his zeal, and his blamelessness touching the righteousness which is in the law.

only retain yourselves under the curse, which lies on every man by nature, but you subject yourselves to a new and far more tremendous one. The law denounces its curse against every son of Adam, as a child of wrath; but it comes in with a new curse against every one, who rejects the blessing, who disbelieves the Gospel. Take heed, therefore, that ye despise not him that speaketh unto you from heaven. You may escape the first curse of the law by flying to the blessing of the Gospel. But if you persist in despising this, in treading under foot the Son of God; there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin, but a fearful looking for of judgment, and of fiery indignation, that shall devour the adversary.

S E R M O N XVII.

ON THE DECEITFULNESS OF THE HEART, IN EMBRACING FALSE GROUNDS OF CONFIDENCE.

ISAIAH xliv. 20.

He feedeth of ashes; a deceived heart hath turned him aside, that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say, Is there not a lie in my right hand?

IN the two preceding discourses we have illustrated various proofs of the deceitfulness of the heart, in its resting on false grounds of confidence. We now proceed to offer some others.

12. SOME may rest on their sufferings in the cause of Christ. There is nothing that we can either do or suffer, but the deceitfulness and legality of the heart will incline to assume as a ground of confidence before God. Although one may renounce works as the meritorious cause of justification, yet the heart may build on sufferings as some foundation of boasting. One may adopt the language of the disciples with a self-righteous disposition; Lord, we have left all, and followed thee: what shall we have therefore? As it is not sufficient to constitute a martyr, that a man suffers under a persuasion of the goodness of his cause, unless the cause itself be really good; as it is not enough that the cause itself be good, unless his principles be correspondent; one may suffer as a martyr in the eyes of men, while the cause, for which he suffers, may be the only martyr in the estimation of God, because of the impurity of his motives. The approbation of man, or the prospect of having his name embalmed in the annals of the Church, may be his only end, and not the glory of God, or the vindication of injured truth. For a man may not only give all his goods to feed the poor, but his body to be burned, and yet want charity. He may be destitute of that genuine love to God, that would make him prefer his glory to every selfish consideration.

13. OTHERS may depend on a notional faith.—Some are persuaded of the truth of the Gospel. But they prove that their faith is not divine, because it is unfruitful. They may renounce all apprehensions of acceptance before God, through their profession, privileges, or moral duties; and flatter themselves that they really believe. But their faith reaches no farther than their understandings. It does not really embrace that good to which it pretends to assent. It makes no appropriation of it in a particular manner. It does not purify the heart from sin; nor does it adorn the life. Besides, they trust in their faith, as the ground of boasting before God. Even the act of genuine

genuine faith does not justify meritoriously. This belongs only to the object which faith apprehends, the righteousness of the Redeemer. For, if man were justified by faith as his act, boasting could not be excluded by the law of faith, salvation would still be by works; and the new covenant would differ from the old in name only. There were some in the first ages of Christianity, who thought that such a faith might profit them. These are reproved by James, What doth it profit, my brethren, although a man say, he hath faith, and have not works? Can faith save him?* Indeed, it may be said, that those, whom James reproved, are not blamed by him for trusting in their faith as the foundation, but for trusting in a false faith as the evidence of justification. But though this were granted, yet we ought to remember what hath been formerly observed; that generally when men adopt a false evidence of justification, they do not stop here, but insensibly build upon it as the foundation. Certain we are, that, in our time, some heretics maintain the act of faith to be the only meritorious cause of justification; while others make it so in part, as being what they call the root or beginning of justification. Now, we may not only suppose, that these heretics, as crediting their own doctrine, rest upon their faith; but there is too much reason to apprehend, that others who renounce such false doctrine in their judgments, do really embrace it in their hearts.

WHILE some satisfy themselves with a mere general historical faith, others seem to go farther. They pretend to appropriate Christ to themselves, to assure themselves of salvation through his blood. Yet it is much to be feared, that many such deceive themselves, both as to the foundation of their faith, and as to its place. They may deceive themselves as to the foundation of it. They believe that they shall be saved, not upon the testimony of God in his word; but they take up this persuasion at their own hand. They believe that

* James ii. 14.

that they do believe. They believe not in the faithfulness of God, but in their own faith. Themselves are the object of their faith. They also err as to the place of this presumptuous faith. For they trust in it. To this they recur for pacifying conscience, and so give it the place of a foundation. When conscience accuses them of want of holiness, they silence its accusations by producing their faith. They tell conscience, that holiness would not justify them before God, that this can only be done by faith in the blood of Christ. This is true indeed. Neither works before, nor after justification, can merit any thing at the hand of God. But let such beware, lest they wickedly make the doctrine of grace an apology for their lusts. Can Christ be the minister of sin? God forbid. Although faith alone, as an instrument, justifies; yet it does not justify as alone. A solitary faith is not a true faith. As the body without the spirit is dead, even so faith without works is dead also. This species of faith, as well as the former, is merely notional. If your own faith be the ground of your comfort under troubles of conscience, if you fly to this as your hiding-place, you trust in man, and your heart departeth from the Lord. This also is an evidence of your want of genuine faith. For it is the nature of this grace, in all its actings, entirely to disclaim itself. It is said, Let a man deny himself. Now, faith is the greatest act of self-denial. It not only renounces all that a person is, or hath, or hath done, or can do; but it renounces itself, in every acting. Suffer not conscience to be at rest, merely because you have a kind of faith. So had the stony-ground-hearers. So had the rulers, who did not confess Christ. Simon Magus believed. Nay, *the devils also believe, and their faith is more firm and operative than that of many professors, for they tremble. Nor do they believe in so general a manner as many. For although they cannot apprehend the promise, which was never directed to them; yet, they not only credit the truth of the threatening, but they appropriate it to themselves. Art thou come to torment us before the time? Therefore they tremble, because from their knowledge of the immutable faithfulness of God, they believe and are assured of their own miserable interest in the threatening. The Apostle supposes it possible that a man might have all faith, not merely an historical faith, but that which was miraculous, to such a degree, as that he might remove mountains, and yet want charity, and so be nothing.

* James ii. 19.

14. THE deceitfulness of the heart operates in others, by making them rest upon supposed attainments in holiness. This is a more refined species of legality than any of these formerly mentioned. Such persons do not rest on the works done by them, like those formerly spoken of, but on the holiness supposed to be evidenced by the performance of these works. In profession, and in their own apprehensions, they altogether renounce salvation by works. But still they some way or other seek for it, as procured by that holiness, which they either consider as the fruit of their works, or as certainly demonstrated by them. They rely not on their profession of religion, on their regularity in attendance on ordinances, or on their performance of moral duties; but on the holy frame and temper of their hearts in the observation of all these. They do not, like the true believer, esteem holiness as the way to heaven, with respect to meetness; as the blessed prelude; and, indeed, an eminent part of it: but view it rather as the foundation of their hopes of enjoying eternal life. Instead of making it the evidence, which is the proper place of evangelical holiness; they rely on it as the foundation. Such hypocritical professors proceed a great deal farther in religion than others. This is, therefore, a deceit, which is far more dangerous, because of its greater depth and subtilty. They are not merely concerned about the outside of duties, but taste of the comforts of them. They have the semblance of all the graces of the Holy

Holy Spirit, without the reality of one of them.— They have, it may be, an extensive knowledge of the things of God. They can talk, with the greatest fluency, of the mysteries of religion; and have a doctrinal belief of them all. Nay, their knowledge would seem to be not merely speculative, but in some measure practical; because it is not destitute of influence on the conversation. They may appear to be strong in faith. Their faith may even seem stronger than that of those, whose hearts are right with God; because, not being savingly acquainted with the plague of their own hearts, they have very little jealousy over themselves. To appearance their love is very ardent, towards both God and their neighbour.— They may flatter themselves, that they place all their delight in ordinances, because they fancy that therein they enjoy real communion with God. They may also suppose that they love the brethren with a pure heart fervently, because they falsely consider themselves as children of the same family. Their zeal is so keen, that they often go as he-goats before the flock, and may even seem more concerned about the interests of religion than those who are the children of Zion. They may give many evidences of repentance, and be in fastings often. Their tears may flow copiously in the duties of religion. They may be remarkable for humility, and conspicuous in liberality. Yet all these things may be the mere effects of natural affection, quickened by some common operation of the Spirit, without any of his regenerating or sanctifying efficacy.

It is a supposable case, that those who are entire strangers to saving grace, may be *enlightened, and taste of the heavenly gift, and be made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and taste the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come. They may be enlightened by a common work of the Spirit on the understanding, opening up the doctrines of revelation, and producing an assent to their truth; while there is no such such efficacy as is necessary to bring the will cordially to embrace them. They may taste of the heavenly gift. They may have some affecting discoveries of Christ, who is elsewhere called God's unspeakable gift, made to their understandings, so as to operate on their affections; some glowing apprehensions of the grace or glory of Christ, and of the excellency of the way of salvation through him, especially in their imaginations: although they do not really receive this heavenly gift into their hearts by faith unfeigned. They may be made partakers of the Holy Ghost, not only in his ordinary operations on the soul, but in his miraculous gifts, as in the first period of Christianity. They may taste of the good word of God. They taste, although they do not really eat* and feed on it by faith. They may not only have their understandings opened to perceive its truth, but some experience of its power on conscience, and some feeling of its sweetness in their affections, of the goodness of this word, so that they persuade themselves, that they not only assent to it as true, but embrace it as good. The hearers, who are likened to the stony ground, received the word with joy. Those who attended on the ministry of John Baptist were willing to rejoice in his light for a season. They may derive an ill-founded comfort from the promises of the word, falsely and presumptuously supposing that they have an actual interest in them. They may also taste of the powers of the world to come. As they flatter themselves with the hope of eternal life, they may, through the warmth of their imaginations, and fervour of their affections, in some degree realize, not only the awful doctrines of a resurrection and judgment, but the joys of heaven, by their fancied communion with God, and experience of the love of Christ †. The inspired penman supposes,

* Heb. vi. 4, 5.

* Jer. xv. 16.

† Some, who understand the powers of the world to come of the different miraculous gifts bestowed on the first Christians, endeavour to confirm their opinion by the use of the same expression, chap. ii. 5. where the penman speaks of the New Testament dispensation supposes, that all this might be, and yet that the subjects of it might fall away, so that it should be impossible to renew them again to repentance.

If the heart can proceed so very far in self-deceit, if an unrenewed man can attain so great a resemblance to the true believer; O! how great must the deceitfulness of the heart be! How mournful is it, that through the remains of corruption, the saint himself is at times so much misled by the workings of deceit, somewhat similar to these mentioned. Thou, believer, whose heart hath been opened to God, and opened to thyself, by him who hath the key of the house of David, canst tell from thy sad experience, how very prevalent this species of deceit is with thee, which is especially detestable, because so secret, subtle and insinuating; and dangerous, because ever ready to mar the success and comfortable fruits of all thy duties. This is one of these foxes that so frequently penetration under the designation of the world to come. But it must be observed, that although these expressions are translated in the same way in our version, they are different in the original. The word rendered world in chap. ii. 5. (οικουμένην) properly signifies the habitable earth; and from its connection, seems to denote the New Testament dispensation. But the word here used is αἰῶν, age or world. It is acknowledged, that this word is sometimes used to denote the world in its present state. But we may safely assert, that not one passage can be pointed out, where it can be understood in this sense, when connected with μέλλον, as in the expression under consideration: whereas, the same phrase is found in other places, where it is granted on all hands, that it signifies the future state; as Mat. xii. 32.—It shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come. Eph. i. 21.—not only in this world, but also in that which is to come. Another word of the same meaning, (ἔρχομενος) is joined with αἰῶν, Mark x. 20. and Luke xviii. 30. in both which places, the concluding expression eternal life, undeniably explains the meaning of the foregoing, the world to come. Those who understand this of miraculous gifts, think their sentiment confirmed by the word δύναμις, which is generally used to denote these gifts. But, although this be granted, it will by no means amount to a proof. For this very word sometimes refers to the eternal state, as in Mat. xxii. 29. and Mark xii. 24. where it is used in reference to the resurrection of the dead, which is one of the powers of the world to come;—Not knowing the power of God.

quently spoil thy vines, and destroy their tender grapes. This often robs thee of thy joy and consolation in the very blossom. When thou hast been engaged in a difficult duty, or subjected to a severe trial; when thou hast obtained an eminent degree of communion with thy God; dost thou not often feel a secret but powerful inclination in thy heart, to claim some degree of merit to thyself, in performing the duty, or in sustaining the trial; to admire the lustre of thy own holiness; and to flatter thyself that thou must certainly be greatly beloved of the Lord, because thou art so holy and lively in his service? Art thou not ready to think in this manner, as if man could be profitable to God, as he that is wise is profitable to himself, as if it had been thine own sword or arm, that had saved thee, as if holiness had been the produce of thy own heart, or as if God could be a debtor to thee for what thou hast received from himself?

THIS part of the subject points out to us the great necessity of using all diligence in inquiring into our real state before God. In urging this duty, we might enlarge on the fatal consequences of self-deceit, on the impossibility of mending matters in the eternal world, on the indignity offered to God by a false profession, on the holy confidence in duty, which attends a well-grounded persuasion that we do not run in vain. But at present we shall only mention one thing, which may be considered as a powerful argument, although only of a secondary nature, enforcing the necessity of the greatest earnestness and diligence in examining our state; and it is this, that he who makes a profession of religion, without knowing its power, gives himself all the fatigue of religion, in an outward respect, while he denies himself all its joys and comforts. Going about a multitude of duties, perhaps many more than God has commanded, he wearies himself in the fire for very vanity. Whereas the same duties, if performed from the principle of a renewed heart, in relation to Christ as the only Mediator, through the strength of his grace, and and for the glory of God, would be a bringing forth of fruit to life eternal.

You, who are trusting in any of these false grounds, we would earnestly entreat to consider your danger, ere it be too late. The house built on the sand will certainly fall, and if you continue in it, must involve you in its ruin. The further you proceed, if you stop short of true religion, the more hopeless is your case, the more aggravated will be your misery. Your case is the more hopeless, because the more refined your delusions are, conscience is in the greater danger of retaining its false peace. The more near that you seem to be to the kingdom of heaven, the farther are you really from it, and the greater is the risk, that you may never enter into it. Publicans and harlots shall enter before you. Your misery, if you continue in your false confidence, will be the more dreadful. It will receive a double keenness from your fond and flattering hopes. Your superior knowledge, profession, privileges and attainments will greatly aggravate your condemnation. Justice is ready to overtake you. The hail shall sweep away every lying refuge, the storm shall overflow every deceitful hiding place. Consider what God is saying to you as to the folly of such hopes; The moth shall eat them up like a garment, and the worm shall consume them as wool; but my righteousness shall be for ever, and my salvation from generation to generation. Betake yourselves to Christ as your refuge. For a man shall be an hiding place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest. These two immutable things, in which it is impossible for God to lie, his promise, and his oath, afford you strong consolation in fleeing for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before you.

You, who have been in some measure delivered from the deceitfulness of your hearts, and have seen the blood of Christ to be the only ground of confidence, may be hence entreated to consider the necessity of exercising a godly jealousy over yourselves, and of having your evidences for eternity set in the clearest light; that you may not be ashamed before the Son of man at his coming. You see how far false professors may go in religion; and this should excite you to the greater watchfulness over your hearts. But there is a question, which may here occur to some, a question, the solution of which materially affects every one of us before God. If false professors may have so eminent attainments, and so remarkable a resemblance of true holiness; how may we distinguish between such attainments, as are the fruit of the Spirit's saving work, and those, which only flow from natural affections, or from a common operation? Lest we should make the heart of the righteous sad, whom God hath not made sad, we shall endeavour to answer this question; that the Lord's people, through his blessing, may discern the reasonableness of their comfort; and that pretenders may perceive the falseness of their confidence.
be

I. THESE attainments, which are saving, have always an humbling tendency. They make the subject of them think meanly of himself, perceive much of the hatefulnes of sin, and of his own loathsomeness on account of it. Indeed, he thinks always the less of himself, the more he is favoured with these attainments. When Isaiah saw the Lord high and lifted up; he cried out, wo is me! for I am undone; I am a man of unclean lips *. What was the language of Job, when he obtained a discovery of his God in mercy? I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth thee; wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust, and in ashes †. This is expressly promised, as the fruit of the Spirit's gracious operation and inhabitation. I will put my Spirit within you,—then shall ye loathe yourselves in your own sight for your iniquities, and for your abominations ‡. But those attainments, which are merely the result of natural affections, or of a common operation, generally fill the person with pride and self-conceit. Knowledge puffeth up, but love edifieth.

2. SAVING

* Isa. vi. 5. † Job xlii. 5, 6. ‡ Ezek. xxxvi. 27. 31.

2. SAVING attainments are consistent with a godly jealousy. The person is anxious till they be brought to the touchstone of the word, till he try them by the law, and by the testimony. This temper does the Apostle Paul, who was so eminent in godliness, discover: I therefore so run, not as uncertainly—lest that by any means when I have preached to others, I myself should be a cast-away. But the self-deceiver gives himself little anxiety about the reality of his attainments, and esteems it only a loss of time to bring them to the trial. Thus, he verifies the words of Christ; Every one, that doth evil, hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reprov- ed. But he that doth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest, that they are wrought in God.*

3. THE fruit of solid Christian attainments is thankfulness to God. The believer is afraid of requiting him like a foolish people and unwise. It is the language of his heart; Not unto me, not unto me, but unto thy name be the glory. Like the Psalmist, he wishes that his soul, and all that is within him, were stirred up to blest his holy name. But the false professor is a stranger to this exercise, what pretences soever he may make to it. For the dead praise not the Lord.

4. THE Christian disclaims all his attainments with respect to justification. He values them, indeed, as the fruit of the Spirit, as the testimonies of God's love, and as the evidences of the power of religion in his own soul. But he entirely renounces them, in his habitual exercise, as the foundation of acceptance before God, or of any farther degree of favour from him. Whatever gain Paul reckoned upon in his supposed attainments before conversion; yet after it, he not only renounces all these, but all his real attainments in the exercise of gospel-holiness: What things were gain to me, these I counted loss for Christ. Yea doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord, for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung, that I may win him, and be found in him; not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith*. He accounted resting on attainments even in a converted state, on gracious attainments, and those of the highest kind, to be nothing but seeking a legal righteousness. But he, whose attainments are of a different nature, if he rely not entirely upon them, yet considers them as in part his recommendation to God, and as some ground of boasting before him.

5. SAVING attainments leave a lasting impression on the heart. Even when the affections of the Christian are very languid, the desire of his heart is to God. Even when overpowered by the unrenewed part, he delights in the law of the Lord after the inward man. But the self-deceiver finds the influence of religion only when his affections are enlivened. Strip him of these, and you take away his gods, and what has he more? Although at times he may exceed even the real Christian in fervour, yet, because the hard and stony heart remains, when hurried away by corruption, he discovers the old man in all his power, he sins with the full consent of his will, he works iniquity with greediness.

6. THE real believer loses not his confidence in God, even under severe afflictions. With the Prophet he can say; Although the fig-tree shall not blossom—yet I will rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation †. Even where there is a certainty of tribulation, he resolves to keep hold of God as his God. According to the measure of grace he can join with Paul in putting affliction, in all its aspects, at defiance; Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword, &c. ‡. Sometimes he even glories in tribulation. But, in general, afflictions tions discover the vanity of the hope of the hypocrite. This is one evidence that Christ gives of a false profession. *He that received the seed into stony places, the same is he that beareth the word, and anon with joy receiveth it. Yet hath he not root in himself, but dureth for a while: for when tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the word, by and by he is offended. It is not meant as an invariable test; because it is elsewhere supposed that a man may give his body to be burned, and not have charity. But the nature of Christ's language implies that it will generally hold.

* Phil. iii. 7.—9. † Hab. iii. 17, 18. ‡ Rom. viii. 35,—39.

7. THE real Christian does not wish to stop short in his attainments. He never thinks he has gone far enough in religion. He still desires to make greater progress in holiness than he has ever made before.— In this we have also the example of Paul; Not as though I had already attained, or were already perfect:—but this one thing I do, forgetting the things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus †. But, on the contrary, the self-deceiver thinks he has gone far enough in religion. Nay, he scarcely imagines that he can make any advancement, for he counts himself to have apprehended. A great part of his exercise consists in contemplating and admiring the attainments, which, according to his apprehension, he has already made. So, instead of worshipping God, he worships the creature of his own imagination. Instead of considering how far he is behind, he rather inclines to solace himself with his advancement before many around him, and to rest here. This is exemplified in the prayer of the Pharisee: Lord, I thank thee that I am not as other men.

8. THE believer is equal, or at least consistent in his attainments. While he makes progress in duty, in the exercise of grace, in liveliness, and spirituality of affections; he at the same time advances in the mortification rification of sin. And where the heart is truly sincere, these always go hand in hand. Sin becomes more and more hateful, and is more and more subdued. Therefore, when the Apostle declares, that the life which he lived in the flesh was by the faith of the Son of God, with the same breath he says, I am crucified with Christ *. Notwithstanding all pretended attainments in religion, all the warmth of affections, and supposed enlargement of heart, which the hypocrite has in duties; his lusts remain as powerful as ever, if not in his life, at least in his heart. Thus he pulls down with one hand, what he pretends to build with the other. While he professes to advance in holiness as to the duties of religion, he advances in sin by the liberty which he gives to his lusts; to those of a more secret kind at least, the lusts of the mind, such as pride, self-righteousness, and the like. This is a certain proof of hypocrisy; for if I build again the things which I have destroyed, I make myself a transgressor †. The character of Ephraim is applicable to such a professor. Ephraim is a cake not turned ‡. He is entirely unequal and inconsistent in his supposed attainments. While he pretends great advancement in spirituality, he is quite a stranger to mortification. Thus he is like a cake that is half roasted, and half raw. View him on the one side, and he seems almost burnt up by the flame of holy affections. But on the other, he is like dough that is scarcely heated by the fire.

* Matt. xiii. 20, 21.

† Phil. iii. 12.—14.

IN the last place, all true Christians have a real love to holiness. They love it especially for itself, as being the image of God. The advantages arising from it are not their principal motive. They give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness. They rejoice in the beauty of holiness. They love God's law, because it is holy; and the holiness of the Divine nature is one great excitement to adoration §. But pretenders, pretenders, whatever respect they may profess for holiness, as being necessary to support their present self-deceit, or to secure future happiness, do not really love it as the image of God. They may, in some respect, love it as the supposed fruit of their own heart-purification, or of their own endeavours in one form or other; but they cannot love it as the fruit of the Spirit's gracious efficacy.

* Gal. ii. 20. † Gal. ii. 18. ‡ Hos. vii. 8.

§ Psal. xcix. 5. 9.

S E R M O N XVIII.

ON THE DECEITFULNESS OF THE HEART, WITH RESPECT TO THE PERFORMANCE OF DUTY.

PSALM lxxviii. 56, 57.

—And kept not his testimonies ; but turned back, and dealt unfaithfully like their fathers : they were turned aside like a deceitful bow.

UNDER the law God gave this commandment to his people ; Thou shalt not sow thy field with mingled seed, neither shall a garment mingled of linen and woollen come upon thee. In unspeakable condescension, he extended his injunctions even to those matters which are in themselves indifferent, and of little moment ; that we, for whom all these things were especially written, might inquire into their spiritual design. This precept might be meant to inform us, how abominable hypocrisy is in the eye of the holy God. He, in a spiritual sense, sows his field with mingled seed, who partly serves God, and partly Satan and Mammon ; who in duty denies his heart to God ; who assumes an appearance of ardent zeal before men, while indifferent before the Searcher of hearts ; who maintains the form of godliness, but practically denies the power thereof. Like the pretended mother, who insisted for dividing the child ; our natural deceitfulness pleads for a division of the heart. It will profess to give a part to God ; but it must retain the other part for sin.

THIS

THIS Psalm has been evidently designed for stirring up the church of Israel to confidence in God; and to a strict observation of his law. For this end the inspired penman enumerates her many transgressions in former times, shows the aggravation of her iniquity by rehearsing the mighty works of God, and illustrates the danger of unbelief and disobedience, from the consideration of the various judgments formerly inflicted on account of these sins. In the passage immediately before us, he aggravates the guilt of the Israelites in provoking God, notwithstanding his great mercy in leading them safely through the wilderness to the promised land, and in subduing their enemies. Yet, saith he, they tempted and provoked the Most High God. In what respect they did so, he shows in the words of our text; they kept not his testimonies. This word in general denotes the whole revelation that God hath made of himself in the word. The two tables of the law were particularly called the testimony of God; and because these were contained in the ark, it was thence called the ark of the testimony.

HERE it seems especially to signify the ordinances of his worship; as the testimonies of God are directly opposed to the high places and graven images of false deities, mentioned in the following verse; by which they provoked him to anger, and moved him to jealousy. Instead of keeping his testimonies, they turned back. They in heart and practice returned to their old lusts and idols, and dealt unfaithfully like their fathers. They resembled them in breaking through their solemn engagements to God. They were turned aside like a deceitful bow. When they seemed to be directing their feet into the way of his testimonies, they acted treacherously with God. They were like a bow, which, though the aim be exactly taken, shoots the arrow wide of the mark.

FROM these words we propose to illustrate the deceitfulness of the heart with respect to duty. We may,

may, first, consider some evidences of this principle in the performance of duty. And, secondly, in the omission of it.

First, As to the performance of duty, the heart discovers its power of deceit,

1. By diverting a person from those duties, that are most spiritual in their nature. The heart, as carnal and unrenewed, is in Scripture often designed the flesh, to express its grossness, corruption and opposition to every thing that is truly spiritual. Though in itself spiritual, as being immaterial, it is called fleshly, on account of its subjection to sin, and because, in man's state of depravity, the inferior faculties have acquired the ascendant over the superior. In God's sight it has in this respect lost the spirituality of its nature: for in its conformity to the Divine image consists the greatest glory and perfection of the spirituality of the soul. May we not view it as a striking evidence of the carnality of the heart, that it is peculiarly reluctant to all those duties, which are most spiritual in their nature? Indeed, every duty that we owe to God, may in some sense be said to be spiritual; because it can only be acceptable to him, when our spirits, as renewed, are engaged in it. But some duties are more especially spiritual, as more immediately relating to God himself, who is a Spirit, and will be worshipped in spirit; and as demanding a closer engagement of the soul than others, which are more of an outward kind.

Thus, the heart will often submit to those duties which a man owes to his neighbour, while it spurns at those, of which God is the immediate object. Nay, it may bear with a regular attendance on public or private worship. But it is very averse from secret duties. It is extremely unfond of secret prayer, because in this ordinance the worshipper has to do with God only. When one has ill will to another, he may pass the time tolerably in his company while others are present; but he feels very disagreeably, when when left alone with him. Self-examination and personal fasting are duties to which the carnal heart makes the keenest opposition, because it is their tendency to give a fuller view of sin, of the emptiness of self, of its own deceitfulness, and of the necessity of renewed supplies of grace; and because these are, in the experience of believers, made eminently useful in increasing hatred of sin, and the desire of the soul to the name of Christ, and to the remembrance of him. It may bear with a careless, unaffected reading of the word; but meditation on it, in a dependence on the Spirit as the great interpreter, is an exercise to which it discovers great backwardness? because the word, thus accompanied, is a lamp to the feet, and a light to the path; because it is profitable in so many respects,—for doctrine, for reproof, for correction and instruction in righteousness. It will plead that these duties are of too difficult a nature; that they require too close an attention; that it is very provoking to God to perform them carelessly; and therefore insist for the neglect of them, and for giving a preference to those of a more general nature. The Pharisees were very willing to tithe mint, and anise, and cummin, but they omitted faith and the love of God, as well as the weightier matters of the law with regard to man*. But the great reason of this aversion of the heart, as unrenewed, from more secret duties, is that it is afraid of a close dealing with God, lest its own iniquities be discovered; and is apt in such a situation to say to him, as the wicked king to the faithful Prophet, Hast thou found me, O mine enemy? This leads us to observe,

2. THAT it endeavours to prevent any real communion with God, and to distract the mind by wanderings in duty. We have seen that the heart, as deceitful, always discovers great aversion from those duties that are most spiritual in their nature. But it discovers a still greater reluctance to spirituality in these, and in every other. If it prevail not with the professor, so far as to divert him entirely from engagement in

* Mat. xxiii. 23.; Luke xi. 42.

Christian exercise, especially of a spiritual nature ; it will struggle hard to hinder him from engaging in it in a spiritual manner. It will argue from the great fatigue to which the mind is subjected, when constantly on the stretch, when still exerted to its utmost in Divine service. It may even, at times, submit to the exertion of all our natural abilities for the discharge of a duty, of some constant exercise of rational endeavours, of some intenseness of the mind ; but it strives with violence against a spiritual engagement of heart, consisting in an entire dependence on the grace of Christ, and present improvement of it, by deriving supplies from his inexhaustible fulness. This is a stroke against corruption, which it will use every effort to parry. When it finds that God demands the heart in every duty, it will consent to give him the rational understanding, if it cannot make a better of it ; or some degree of affections working in a natural way : but it cannot accede to the proposal of giving the whole heart, as implying not only the exercise of every faculty, but of every one in a spiritual manner. At the thought of devoting the whole heart to God in every service, it trembles for its beloved lusts ; because it is impossible that there can be a real, spiritual engagement of soul in any duty, but it must directly tend to the crucifixion of these. For every advancement which the Christian makes in communion with his God, leads him farther into himself, and quickens him in carrying on the war against his spiritual enemies. Every act of spiritual worship, that ascends from the renewed soul to God, may be said to descend again, and to rebound on the head of some one corruption, in advancing its gradual destruction : as every considerable breach made in the wall of a besieged city, not only gives opportunity to the assailants to enter in, and brings them nearer to possession ; but exposes the besieged to destruction : as they are in the greatest danger of being buried in the ruins.

To prevent these consequences, the heart incites to wandering and distraction in religious worship. This is the case both with saints and sinners. The greatest part of gospel-hearers honour God with the lip, while the heart is far from him. They seem to listen, and it may be, attentively, to what is spoken to them in the name of the Lord; yet they scarcely attend to a single sentence. Instead of hearing his word, as those who must give account, their hearts are often following their eyes; they are making their observations on the appearance and deportment of those around them; or perhaps, their hearts are still farther removed. They are forming worldly schemes, and meditating on their ordinary employments. To many professors, the Sabbath, and even the time of Divine service, is a season for recollecting all that they have done, or should have done through the foregoing week, and for planning the operations of the following. Then they consider what business they shall do, what promises they shall fulfil, what visits they shall make, probably, what mischief they shall execute, on the six ensuing days; even when they profess to be worshipping God the Spirit; or, if they hear what is said, it is only with the bodily ear. They give themselves no trouble to attend with the heart. They come unto thee as the people cometh, and they sit before thee as my people, and they hear thy words, but they will not do them: for with their mouth they shew much love, but their heart goeth after their covetousness. Can any fruit be expected from such professors? Surely No. For the gospel is a mere sound to them; and lo! *thou art unto them as a very lovely song of one that hath a pleasant voice, and can play well on an instrument: for they hear thy words, but they do them not? Instability is mentioned by the Apostle James, as an evidence of deceitfulness. A double-minded man is unstable in all his ways †. The wicked is like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt ‡. This evil is to be found, in a great degree,

* Ezek. xxxiii. 31, 32.

† Jam. i. 8.

‡ Isa. lvii. 26.

gree, with many real Christians, and in some degree with all. They experience instability of heart in every duty. In public worship they are often harassed by this. When ready to think that their hearts are fixed, trusting in the Lord; ere they are aware, they find them wandering to the ends of the earth. When they endeavour to pour them out in prayer to the God of their life, and have, perhaps, attained some enlargement in his service; they find that, in a moment, the merest trifle will distract their minds, and carry them away from him. That, which they would scorn to take notice of in the presence of an earthly superior, or even of an equal, will steal away their attention from God, and make them offer the sacrifice of fools. When they read his blessed word, their minds are often so unsettled, as not to observe the literal meaning of the expressions. When they sit down at his holy table, and make the most solemn approach that man can make to God, before he stand at his judgment-seat; even there, they find it impossible to restrain their hearts from wandering. When they would view the Redeemer as set forth crucified, a very small matter will so divert the attention, as to make them forget the very duty in which they are engaged. When the Christian would, in any duty, try the exercise of faith in Christ, as his Lord and Saviour, he finds many temptations arising from his own deceitfulness, that in a moment turn away his eyes from Christ, and fix it on that which profiteth not. This instability, as far as it prevails, prevents his present comfort, mars the duty in which he is engaged, and hinders his progress in grace. When, like Reuben, he is unstable as water, how can he prevail?

3. By inciting to hypocrisy. The most eminent Christians will be sensible of the great prevalence of this corruption in religious worship. It discovers itself by a secret desire to be seen of men. There is no duty that the saint can perform, if it be liable to outward observation, wherein he is wholly abstracted from this sinister motive. Although he habitually prefers

prefers the praise of God to that of man ; yet the natural inclination which every one has to support his own character, and gain the esteem of others, will always in some measure prevail. Can we deny, that it is frequently a sense of the eye of man being on us, which influences us to some fervour in duty, more than a desire of the glory of God ; or, at least, that the one is greatly blended with the other, often obscures the evidences of its sincerity, and checks its fervour ? That real Christians are in great danger of assuming appearances of religion, and of making professions, from which their hearts are presently estranged, is very evident from the example of so eminent a saint as Peter. Before the arrival of the messengers from Cornelius, he had received a revelation from God, informing him that the Gentiles were to be made partakers of the same privileges with the Jews, and had afterwards the most satisfying evidence, that on the Gentiles also was poured out the gift of the Holy Ghost ; yet, when at Antioch, he acted with duplicity. For after he had eaten for some time with the Gentiles, he withdrew himself from them, when some Jews came down from Jerusalem ; and not only lived after the manner of the Jews, but compelled the Gentile converts to live in the same manner. On this account Paul withstood him to the face, because he was to be blamed, and charged him with dissimulation, (Gal. ii. 11,—14.) or, as the word may be rendered hypocrisy. For the literal translation of ver. 13. is, and the other Jews hypocrised likewise with him ; inasmuch that Barnabas also was carried away with their hypocrisy. The enemies of holiness often call the people of God hypocrites, because they perform duties which themselves neglect ; while it is the greatest presumption in them to judge the heart, without the most undeniable external evidences. But every real Christian, although he can appeal to God his habitual sincerity, and constant desire of it, will be ready to acknowledge, that often could they look into his heart during the performance of duty, they would find far more reason for the charge. Were they his witnesses in secret, they might often hear him complaining, that his heart is as a bow that shooteth deceitfully; and confessing, that amidst all his outward appearances and inward struggles, he is carnal and sold under sin.—Hypocrisy discovers itself in the exercise of believers, not only by their desire to be seen of men, but even in their secret duties, when there is no opportunity of outward observation, by an hypocritical desire to be seen of God. Our meaning is, that the people of God are sometimes disposed to appear to him more fervent in duty than they really are, to make professions of love to him which they do not presently feel, to express a hatred of sin and desire of his favour, without the immediate sense of either in their hearts.
more

4. By prompting the professor to retain sin in his heart, even when he draws near to God. At all times it is our duty to endeavour the destruction of this irreconcilable enemy of God, and of our souls. But it is more especially incumbent, when we are about to sit ourselves immediately before the Searcher of Hearts in any ordinance of his appointment. For the indulgence of any sin will deprive us of holy confidence. If our heart condemn us, much more will God, who is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things. It is the greatest insult to him, to come into his presence with a heart locking sin in its embraces. And if we regard iniquity in our hearts, we may be assured that he will not hear us. Therefore our Lord exhorts us, when we are to offer a gift, if our brother has ought against us, first to go and be reconciled to him, and then to come and offer our gift. To the same purpose are the words of his servant Paul, when speaking particularly of the greatest external act of religion; Therefore let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth *. By an allusion to the ordinance of God with respect to the observation of the passover.

* 1 Cor. v. 8.

passover, sin in general is called leaven; because when suffered either in a collective body, or in an individual, it pervades and sours the whole lump, and sincerity is opposed to this leaven; because wherever it is suffered, the heart is acting under the influence of deceit. Now, in the prospect, or in the performance of any instituted duty, the heart often insinuates, that there is no necessity for all this strictness. It either hides its leaven as much as possible from the eye of conscience, and pretends that it is all purged out already; or pleads that it is so little that it cannot affect the lump, that it cannot spoil the duty; or, without attempting to diminish it, boldly avows that there is no danger in retaining it. Thus the person may be prevailed with, perhaps, to eat and drink unworthily, and so to eat and drink judgment to himself, and to venture on that awful denunciation; *Cursed be he that doth the work of the Lord deceitfully, and cursed be he that keepeth back his sword from blood. He does so by keeping back his sword from the blood of his spiritual enemies, that war against the soul. He brings that which was torn, and the lame, and the sick; although God hath said, Cursed be the deceiver, who voweth and sacrificeth unto the Lord a corrupt thing †.

5. By exciting a person to rely on his own strength. This attempt the heart, as deceitful, often makes, well knowing that if it can be successful in producing so false a dependence, it will effectually prevent all the blessed fruits which would spring from duty, if performed in the strength of the Lord. For he, who engages in it in his own ability, deliberately procures the inheritance of the curse, instead of observing the appointed means of inheriting the blessing. For it is declared, Cursed be man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord ‡. The legal observation of duty, instead of bringing one nearer to God, drives one farther away from him, and is a voluntary renunciation of him. Therefore, in this respect, is the heart heart said to depart from the Lord. Although the Holy Spirit pronounces this sentence on the man who rejects Divine strength; yet the false heart maintains its doctrine, and recommends its own as the surest ground of confidence. It insinuates that it is a very uncertain method of performing duty, to rely on help, which is altogether invisible; and that it is therefore preferable to depend on that strength which man is more assured of, as belonging to himself, and being ever present with him. It particularly employs the natural principle of self-gloriation as an argument against, at least, a total dependence on the Lord; because then a person, let him perform duty ever so well, must disclaim all, and confess himself to be entirely a debtor to free grace. With this the heart cannot be satisfied. It always presents its claim for some share of the glory. If it seem to consent that God should have a part, still it inclines to reserve the principal part to itself. Believers often discover this self-confidence; though, in general, they feel the consequences of it with severity. We have an instance of this also in the history of Peter. When our Lord foretold that all his disciples should leave him in the hour of his bitterest sufferings, Peter contradicted him, and asserted, that although all men should deny him, yet he would not; nay, that although he should die with him, he would not deny him. The warm declaration of love and attachment to his Master, was in itself commendable. But he grievously erred in forming and expressing his resolution entirely in his own strength. And as a chastisement for his self-confidence, the Lord suffered him awfully to display and feel his own weakness, by leaving him without the present influences of his grace, the assistance of which he had despised, and giving him up to the power of his own corruptions; in consequence of which he not only denied his Lord, but curst and swore that he knew him not.

* Jer. xlviii. 10.

† Mal. i. 13, 14.

‡ Jer. xvii. 5.

6. It pleads the uprightness of its intention as an apology for a multitude of defects. As it is declared, with respect to the duty of contributing to the necessities of others, that *if there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not: the heart lays hold of this, and converts it into an excuse for many sins. Is a duty abridged or carelessly performed, from the prevalence of a worldly spirit? The deceitful heart suggests, that God will overlook this, because the person wished to do well. Hath the mind been filled with distracting thoughts during the performance? Comfort shall be drawn from the compassionate declaration of our Lord; The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak: while the defect hath chiefly proceeded from carnality of spirit. Or, perhaps, one duty is maimed, under the pretence of performing another, not presently required. Thus Saul excused himself for disobedience with respect to the Amalekites, under the pretence that the people had spared the best of the sheep, and of the oxen, to sacrifice unto the Lord God†. Indeed this deceit of the heart is the source of all that corrupt doctrine of sincerity as the ground of acceptance, by which the covenant of grace is converted into a legal covenant, or new law, unknown both to God, and to those who are the subjects of godly sincerity.
with

7. THERE are many, on the other hand, who please themselves with the form of duty, without any regard to the intention. To such professors it appears in the highest degree unreasonable, injurious, and absurd to deny that they can perform good works; while they present many prayers, regularly attend public ordinances, and do so many actions of kindness to their brethren of mankind. Can these be evil works, which God expressly commands? Or can they be bad men, when they can do such works? All this would do very well, could these servants ensure themselves, that he, whom they call their master, would look on their performances just as they do, or that he would view them with the eye of man.

VOL. I.

U u

But

* 2 Cor. viii. 12.

† 1 Sam. xv. 15.

But as this is one of the most common, it is also one of the most ruinous deceits that the heart of man is subject to: for the Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart. These actions are, indeed, good as to the matter of them; and at least for the order of society, and for the advantage of others, it were to be wished that men abounded more in them. But the mere external form of duty is comparatively of so little account with God, that, when this is all, even those duties that he hath himself required are rejected by him with detestation. Your incense is an abomination unto me. Why so? Because the right principle is wanting. The duty is performed without proper motives and ends. It is to the secret principle of the heart that the Lord looks. For it is this especially that denominates an action to be good or evil. This doctrine is admitted by you in the ordinary transactions of life. Therefore, in making trial as to facts, do you not, as far as possible, endeavour to discover the motive? What is it that constitutes the difference between a mistake and a lie, or between lawful killing and murder, but the intention of the agent? Now, what is your leading principle in performing these actions, which you boast of as good? Is it not to appease God? And do you not therefore give him the lie; by still considering him as an enemy, while he declares that fury is not in him? Is it not to avoid hell? And do you not therefore want that love which casteth out fear? Is it not to procure heaven? And do you not therefore labour as mere hirelings, not as sons? Is it not to establish your own righteousness? And do you not thus refuse to submit yourselves to the righteousness of God? Is it not often merely to recommend yourselves to others? And is not this to love the praise of men more than the praise of God? In a word, is not Self the great principle, motive, and end of all your religious actions? And can you think that God will accept them as truly good; when you neither love Him with all your heart, nor propose his glory as your

your highest end? Is not this the great reason why God rejected the fasts of his ancient people, when they inquired of him with respect to their continuance; the want of a proper principle in their pretended acts of humiliation? When ye fasted and mourned in the fifth and seventh month, even those seventy years, did ye at all fast unto me, even to me? And when ye did eat, and when ye did drink, did ye not eat for yourselves, and drink for yourselves?*

8. By stirring up the believer to spiritual pride after enjoying the Divine presence in duty. Into this snare he is very apt to fall. All the gracious discoveries which God makes of himself have an humbling tendency, because they at the same time manifest the Christian's unworthiness. The more that one really sees of the glory, holiness, and love of God, the more must one's own meanness, impurity, and enmity appear. Although this is the native tendency of such gracious manifestations, the deceitful heart improves them in a way directly contrary. The more we receive from God, the less reason have we for boasting; because we run the deeper in arrears to sovereign grace. We have, therefore, as little reason for gloriation on this ground, as, in secular concerns, a debtor has on account of the multiplication of his engagements to his creditors. The corrupt heart insinuates the very reverse. It would persuade us, that the more we receive from God in his service, the more he is indebted to us. God denies that man can be profitable to his Maker. The proud heart avers it, and boldly asserts that he is obliged to us for the tribute of spiritual worship which we render to him; although this can only be paid out of his own treasury, by the influences of his grace. Pride makes a foolish appearance in any part of the conduct of man, because it suits one so ill, who is not only dust, but polluted dust. But its folly and extravagance especially appear, when it operates with regard to God. For thus man, by the most dreadful presumption, virtually runs a parallel between God and himself.

Of

* Zech. vii. 5, 6.

Of every species of pride this is the most deceitful, detestable, and dangerous. It is the most deceitful, because it shelters itself under the garb of humility. It is a poison extracted from the sweetest flowers; a weed, which grows up under the covert of the most pleasant plants. It derives its existence, and its strength from the abuse of gracious manifestations on the part of God, and of gracious exercise on that of the Christian. Spiritual pride often arises in the soul, after it has been endeavouring to renounce itself, and professing to be indebted to God for all. Perhaps, it imposes itself on the faint, under the semblance of godly joy, or of the consolations of the Spirit, or of unfeigned gratitude. It is the most detestable kind of pride. For it has less foundation than any other. Pride can never have a true foundation. But whatever shadow of reason there may be for it in the conduct of one man towards another, there can be none with respect to God. For before him the nations are as the drop of a bucket, and as the small dust of the balance; yea, with him, all the nations are counted as less than nothing, and vanity. It is also the most dangerous. Being so deceitful, it is the more difficult to discover it. This kind of pride diffuses its contagion before it is perceived. It also eminently exposes the Christian to the tokens of the Lord's displeasure.

If pride is such an abomination to him in any, that he is said to see the proud afar off, as if he abhorred to take a look of him at hand; how much more abominable and provoking must it be in his own children, who are unspeakably more indebted to him than others. He expresses his indignation, by immediately withdrawing his gracious presence, when it is thus abused. David said in his prosperity, I shall never be moved. Lord, by thy favour thou hast made my mountain to stand strong. But he soon saw his folly; Thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled *. These words might literally refer to his confidence in the outward prosperity of his reign,

* Psal. xxx. 6, 7.

as mountains often metaphorically signify kingdoms; and to the discovery of the vanity of this confidence by some severe chastisement. But it is more than probable that they refer to his religious exercise. At any rate, as these things were written for our learning; as many things, spoken and done literally, contain spiritual instruction, as engrossed in the sacred canon for the use of the Church; and as the exercise of the deceitful heart is the same, in like circumstances, although the subjects be different; the words may be viewed in a spiritual sense. This kind of pride, of which the Psalmist's language may be understood, seems to be the most subtle and refined. It does not appear that he claimed any merit to himself, or that he confided in any spiritual strength, as arising from the exercise of his own powers. He ascribes both the cause and the effect to God. He mentions his favour, good will, or grace as the cause; By THY favour,—and his own standing as the effect of God's operation;—THOU hast MADE my mountain to stand strong. “Wherein then lay his error?” may you say. “Perhaps, we are not to conclude that God hid his face from him, as a testimony of displeasure with any part of his conduct; but only for the trial of his faith. Nay, his exercise seems to be commendable, as expressive of the highest gratitude.” But this agrees not with the tenor of the Psalm, the design of which is evidently to extol God, because of the short duration of his anger. For verse 5th, he makes this declaration; His anger endureth but a moment; and while he acknowledges his offence, he mentions God's gracious return as an evidence of this, verse 11th. Wherein then consisted his sin? He not only seems to have thought that he was henceforth still to enjoy the prosperity of sensible manifestations; I shall never be moved; but to have preferred the gift to the giver, the displays of Divine grace to the gracious God himself, the stream to the ever-living fountain, grace already received to that grace contained in the promise. He exalts himself in his own heart, in the enjoyment enjoyment and evidences of this favour. He speaks, as if former manifestations of Divine love would supply him to the end, without any constant, or even additional supply : Thou hast made my mountain to stand strong, or as it may be read, Thou hast made strength to stand in my mountain ; as if he, either in temporal or spiritual respects, could stand in his own strength. This apprehension would naturally make him neglect the use of means, become remiss in prayer, relax the exercise of faith, and lay aside his watchfulness. Wherefore, he was brought to see the necessity of a continued dependence on the Lord as his helper, verse 10th. We find him in many other places expressing his confidence in the very same language ; I shall never be moved, yet without any token of the Lord's anger. But then, he builds his confidence on another foundation ; upon the Lord's being at his right hand * ; not on that grace, which was already given him, but on that which remained with God †. Or, he expresses his confidence in this language, only as presently claiming God for his rock and salvation ‡. It was better for Paul, after his great manifestations, to be buffeted by the Devil, most probably by some bodily affliction, than by the pride of his own heart : Lest I should be exalted above measure, there was given to me a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan to buffet me. And the very answer that was made to his prayers, under the temptation, taught him this important lesson ;—that his dependence was not to be on any former communications, but on the grace treasured up in Christ, the Head of the covenant : My grace is sufficient for thee ; for my strength is made perfect in weakness §. To illustrate the danger of spiritual pride, and to deter us from it, the example of Satan is held up as a beacon by the Spirit of God : Lest being lifted up with pride, be fall into the condemnation of the Devil **.

9. By

* Pſal. xvi. 8. † Pſal. xxi. 7. ‡ Pſal. lxxii. 2,—6.

§ 2 Cor. xii. 6,—9.  1 Tim. iii. 6.

9. BY dissuading the Christian from duty, when the observation of it is attended with no comfort. We have seen that the heart as deceitful, submits to duty with reluctance, at any rate. But if it fail in this respect, if he be determined to make a trial of duty, in obedience to the Divine command; it will next endeavour, either to mar the success of the exercise, or to drive away the person from it altogether, because he experiences no comfort at all, or a great deal less than he expected. We have in the word of God both precept and example to encourage us to continuance in duty, as the way to comfort. We are commanded to pray without ceasing, always to pray, and not to faint, to pray always with all prayer and supplication, and watch thereunto with all perseverance. Christ spake the parable of the importunate widow and unjust judge, to inculcate the necessity of importunity in religious duties, and improved it by proposing this question; Shall not God avenge his own elect, who cry day and night unto him, though he bear long with them? This question he resolves by the following gracious answer: *I tell you, that he shall avenge them speedily. Not speedily, it may be, according to their limited expectations; but speedily, in answer to their importunate and unremitted supplications. We have many examples in the sacred history, confirming the necessity and efficacy of perseverance in duty, as the way to comfort. Jacob wrestled with the Angel of the covenant till day-break, and said to him; I will not let thee go except thou bless me; and he blessed him there. Ere Paul obtained a gracious answer, he besought the Lord thrice. The Syrophenician woman took all the reproofs of Christ in good part, and continued to urge her request, till at length he said to her; Be it unto thee even as thou wilt. But the deceitful heart would have the believer to make a god of his comforts, by giving up with God, when these are withheld. It speaks in this manner; It is vain to serve God, and what

* Luke xviii. 1.—8.

*what profit is it, that we have kept his ordinance, and that we have walked mournfully before the Lord of Hosts * ? Wherefore have we fasted, and thou seest not ? Wherefore have we afflicted our soul, and thou takest no knowledge † ?* The great end of religious worship is the glory of God. But this the deceitful heart rejects, pleads comfort in the duty itself, together with its agreeable consequences, as the highest end.

10. BY making the person seek comfort from the mere performance of duty. In what way soever the duty has been observed, the heart persuades us to draw consolation from the mere observation of it: as the poor deluded Papist flatters himself, that there is real merit in counting over his beads, or in repeating his prayers, although in an unknown tongue. Even the Christian is in danger of being thus ensnared, by resting on the duty, in which he is engaged with a view to any particular blessing, as if the performance of the duty itself infallibly secured the blessing. As, on the one hand, he is in danger of neglecting the means that God hath appointed; so, on the other, of confiding in them, as if there were an indispensable connection between them and the end. Through his inward deceit, he may be at times ready to apprehend, either that the duty will be accepted of God for the work performed, or that his person will be accepted because of the duty. We ought to be as diligent and fervent in duty, as if our all depended upon it, as if this were really the foundation of our acceptance; and, at the same time, to be as much denied to it, as if the observation thereof were nowise necessary. We must work out our salvation with fear and trembling; but only as assuring ourselves that it is God who worketh in us both to will and to do. We must study to observe all things whatsoever Christ hath commanded, and when we have done all in our power, acknowledge that we are unprofitable servants, and that we have done

far

* Mal. iii. 14.

† Isa. lviii. 3.

far less than what was *our duty to do. It is evident that the Pharisee justified himself before God, because of the performance of some kind of duty. But because of this false confidence, he went down to his house condemned of God: for this is clearly implied in the contrast stated between him and the Publican. Nehemiah pleads with God for the remembrance of his services in such a manner, that at first view we might be apt to imagine, these were the ground of his hope: Remember me, O my God, concerning this, and wipe not out my good deeds that I have done for the house of my God. But we find that he afterwards adds, when urging the same request; Remember me, O my God, concerning this also,—and spare me according to the greatness of thy mercy †. Even while he seems to plead his duties, he entirely disclaims them as meritorious; and relies only on the riches of Divine mercy discovered in the revelation of grace. This shows that when he asks the remembrance of his good deeds, he wishes them to be remembered only as evidences of the sincerity of his love to God, and to his kingdom. The children of God may be earnest with him for the acceptance of their services, even while they renounce them as in any degree meritorious; Hear my prayer, O Lord, saith the Psalmist, give ear to my supplications; in thy faithfulness answer me, and in thy righteousness. And enter not into judgment with thy servant: for in thy sight shall no man living be justified ‡.

11. BY inspiring one with greater boldness in duty, because of former comfort in the observation of it. This disposition is extremely natural, and to the most of professors it may appear perfectly innocent. “May not he, who has received many former assurances of his welcome in approaching a friend, come with greater confidence afterwards?” But, My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord. This is nothing but a more secret working of legality. For the only foundation of our approach to God as a Father, in any duty, is the perfect righteousness, the finished work of him who engaged his heart to approach unto God as a Judge. Therefore, the choicest comforts, the most precious and inestimable tokens of Divine love to us, must never be assumed into an equality with the Son of his love, or that righteousness with which, and on account of which alone, he is well pleased. For Christ hath said; I am the way:—no man cometh to the Father but by me. He is the way, as excluding every other. He is the consecrated way; and therefore, it is sacrilege to think of any other, or to think of altering this by any additions of our own. It is in him only that we have boldness and access with confidence by the faith of him. Without faith it is impossible, in any duty, to please God *. Now, the object of faith is always without us, and never any thing within us. It is not Christ in our hearts, or any evidence of this; but Christ in the promise. Former comforts are not matter of faith, but of experience. Therefore, they cannot be the ground of confidence in drawing near to God. The foundation of the believer's access to God in every duty, through the whole course of the Christian life, is the very same as at first,—nothing but the blood of Jesus. He can have no renewed access to God, but on the self-same ground on which he had his access in the act of justifying faith. Therefore, every right approach to God is just doing this first work over again. He does not come as a faint, that is, on the foot of his faintship; but as still a guilty creature, in himself considered, improving the blood of Christ anew, as the way into the holiest of all. For Christ is not only the door, by which the believer at first enters in, but by which he goes in and out in the constant progress of a life of faith †. Under the law, every renewed approach to God, in public worship, was with blood. Because of the perfection of the one sacrifice of Jesus Christ, there is now no occasion

* Luke xvii. 10.

† Neh. xiii. 14. 22.

‡ Psal. cxliiii. 1.

* Heb. xi. 6.

† John x. 9.

caſion for any other. But we muſt not preſume to come to God, but by offering this anew in the exerciſe of faith. Therefore, every believer is a prieſt, not in the abſurd and irrational ſenſe of the Papiſts, in their idolatrous ſacrifice of the maſs; but becauſe he ſtill holds up to God, in every duty, the one perfect ſacrifice of Jeſus Chriſt our Paſſover. The former enjoyment of communion with God may be admitted, as an encouragement to the renewed obſervation of duty; as a mean for enlivening us in the performance of it; and as a collateral confirmation to weak faith. So the Pſalmiſt improved it; *I will remember thee from the land of Jordan. But it is abuſed, it is idolized; if aſſumed as in any reſpect the foundation of faith, or ground of boldneſs in coming to the throne.—It might in the ſame manner be proved, that if a perſon approach God with leſs boldneſs after apparent repulſes, under the hiding of his countenance, or while conſcious of the Prevalence of iniquity; it proceeds from unbelief and legality. For it demonſtrates, that he does not ſufficiently improve the blood of Chriſt as his only way, and as a way that is conſtantly open even to the chief of ſinners.

THE Apoſtle John, indeed, makes an obſervation in his firſt Epiſtle, chap. iii. 21. which may ſeem, at firſt view, to overturn this doctrine; that if our heart condemn us not, we have confidence towards God. But he does not ſay that this conſciouſneſs of integrity is the foundation of our confidence. He only aſſerts the matter of fact, which no reaſonable perſon can deny;—that a ſenſe of integrity is attended with boldneſs in duty. He is not there treating of the foundation of our acceſs to God, but of that of aſſurance with reſpect to our ſtate, as derived from ſcriptural evidences. For it is expreſsly ſaid, ver. 19. Hereby know we that we are of the truth, and ſhall aſſure our hearts before him. How do we know this? If our heart heart condemn us not, if we are conscious of indulging no known sin, of neglecting no known duty.— Now, what is the result of this consciousness? We approach God in duty with a good conscience, as opposed to one that condemns a person for habitual hypocrisy in religion. But he by no means makes this consciousness the ground of boldness with respect to access and acceptance; nor does he declare that the conscience can become good, can be pacified, or be kept in peace by any of our doings. He asserts nothing more here than what we find elsewhere, that in order to our drawing near with a true heart, we must have our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience *; and that the conscience must be purged from dead works, to serve the living God †. If our heart, saith he, condemn us not, we have confidence towards God; i. e. “If our consciences be really sprinkled “with the blood of Jesus, delivered from a sense of “guilt, and attest our justification before God the “Judge of all, through Jesus the Mediator of the “new covenant; then we with holy confidence draw “near to God as a Father.” But it may be said, that this explanation does not agree with the following words; And whatsoever we ask, we receive of him, because we keep his commandments. But because must not be here understood, as denoting the ground of our success in prayer, but only as expressing an evidence. As God heareth not sinners, but heareth the righteous; when, after proper trial, we have a consciousness of sincerity towards him, we may be assured that he heareth us: not on account of our sincerity as the meritorious cause; but because this sincerity is an evidence of genuine faith in Christ, as our way to the Father. In the same sense he adduces our obedience to God’s commandments as a reason why we may be certain that he will hear us; because obedience is the evidence, as being the fruit of faith. The particle because, is used in the same sense here, as in verse 14. about the meaning of which there can be no doubt; We know that we are passed from death to life, because we love the brethren. No one will say, that our love to the brethren is the cause of our regeneration. It is only mentioned as the evidence. Is the question then asked; "On what account doth God give us whatsoever we ask?" The answer is; It is only for the sake of Christ. But is it inquired; "How may we be assured, that we are such whom God heareth?" The answer is very different. We may be assured of this, because our consciences, after the most accurate examination, testify that we have an unfeigned regard to all God's commandments; whence we may conclude that we are true believers.

* Pſal. xlii. 6.

 which

* Heb. x. 22.

† Heb. ix. 14.

FROM what has now been offered, you may be exhorted to watch over your inward deceitfulness, as it disposes you to formality and deadness in the performance of duty. If your hearts can so far prevail with you, as to suffer religion to dwindle down to a mere form, a stated round of duties; you can expect no progress in grace, no comfortable fruits from this lifeless worship. You will become like the door upon its hinges, which regularly moves backward and forward, but still continues in its old place. Endeavour to walk with God in every duty. This was the attainment of Enoch; and he had this testimony, that he pleased God. Press after fellowship with him in every act of worship, follow hard after him, pant after his presence, as the hart panteth after the water-brooks. One great reason why the people of God enjoy so little communion with him, is that they have this so little for their supreme desire. When conscience summons them to duty, they obey; but how often indifferent whether or not they see the king's face?

IMPLORE deliverance from distractedness in his service. This is highly dishonouring to God, and it robs you of both the comfort and the profit of duty. God doth not reprove his ancient people for want of frequency, but for want of uprightness and fervour in worship. He blames them not for neglecting the form,

form, but for withholding the heart ; Ye said, Behold, what a weariness is it, and ye have snuffed at it, saith the Lord of hosts, and ye brought that which was torn, and the lame, and the sick : thus ye brought an offering. Should I accept this of your hands ? saith the Lord. And this he charges against them as an evidence of the deceitfulness of their hearts in the observation of commanded duty, for it immediately follows : *But cursed be the deceiver, who has in his flock a male, and voweth, and sacrificeth unto the Lord a corrupt thing ; for I am a great king, saith the Lord of hosts. As distraction in duty is a frequent complaint of the people of God, we may suggest to you the following considerations, which, through the divine blessing, will be useful in accomplishing your victory over this operation of deceitfulness.—Beware of rushing into duty, as the horse into the battle. Endeavour to compose your minds for it by serious meditation, either on the solemnity of the duty, or on some spiritual subject, which may tend to fix your attention. And while you thus muse, the fire of holy affection may burn.—Let your minds be constantly impressed with an awful sense of the Divine perfections, and especially when you are about to engage in worship. Seek to have your hearts affected with a deep conviction of God's omniscience. This is his command ; Be still, and know that I am God. Remember that he looketh to the heart, that he will be worshipped in spirit and in truth. Consider his unspeakable Majesty. He is the High and Holy One who inhabiteth eternity, whose name is holy. It is an act of infinite condescension in him to receive the adoration either of men, or of angels. He humbleth himself to behold the things which are done in heaven, and in earth. Consider that he is a jealous God, and that ye cannot serve him. For his jealousy burns like fire.—Endeavour to attain a constant sense of your own vileness before him. The consciousness of your inferiority will make you very attentive, and respectful in the presence of an earthly superior.

* Mal. i. 13, 14.

superior. How much more reason is there for this in the presence of him, who is King of kings. Let your minds be filled with a conviction of the inestimable value of your privilege in having access to his throne. Formality and distraction in duty are greatly owing to the want of a just impression of the importance of our liberty of access.—Study an affecting sense of the greatness and urgency of your needs. He who supplicates life or any eminent mercy from another, will not readily forget the intention of his approach to him, or wander from the principal subject. It absorbs his whole attention, because he knows his necessity. You have eternal life, and many other important blessings to ask of God: and may not the magnitude of these arrest your attention?—Habituate your affections to the contemplation of heavenly things. Set your affections on things above. This will greatly prevent distraction in worship; because spiritual contemplation will become, in some measure, your natural element. It is the ordinary carnality of the affections, that so easily steals away the heart in duty.—Try to restrain them in their first wanderings. It is far more easy to stop a chink, than to resist the violence of a torrent. Keep the heart above all keeping.—Avoid those objects that ordinarily distract your attention. Make a covenant with your eyes. Keep a watch over all your senses; restrain your imagination.—Depend not on your own natural or spiritual powers. Trust in the Lord with all thy heart, and lean not to thine own understanding. Put your hearts into his hand. Commit thy way to God, trust him; and he will bring it to pass. While engaged in other duties, often look to the Lord in ejaculatory prayer. Even a look may lighten you. Intreat that he may unite your hearts to fear his name.—Improve every duty, as if assured that it were to be your last. You cannot say of any duty, that this may not be the case. Therefore whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might.—Ponder the great advantages resulting from stability in Divine worship. It is often attended or succeeded by a comfortable sense of upholding grace, as the Psalmist testifies; My soul followeth hard after thee, and thy right hand upholdeth me. Peace is its concomitant. Great peace have they who love thy law. In this way the Lord most ordinarily gives the gracious answer. Ye shall seek me, and find me, when you shall search for me with all your heart. On the contrary, by indulging vanity in God's service, you mock him, and expose yourselves to the tokens of his displeasure. You take his name in vain, and he will not hold you guiltless.

AGAIN, when you obtain nearness to the Lord, seek to be clothed with humility. For God resisteth the proud, but he giveth more grace to the humble. Arm against spiritual pride. Learn of Christ, who is meek and lowly in heart. When you have enjoyed enlargement in duty, be concerned to renounce self, to ascribe all to God, and to wrestle with him, that he may cast down every imagination and high thing that exalteth itself, in your hearts. Instead of fixing your eye upon the comfort you have received, try to fix it on the God of all comfort, and to turn it inward to the wickedness that lodgeth in you, as a mean of self-abasement.

IN a word, depend only on the strength of Divine grace in every duty. Claim an interest in it, saying, Surely in the Lord, have I strength. Pray for the Spirit. As it is through Christ, so it is by this one Spirit, that we all have access to the Father. Without his influence, you can neither have comfort in duty, nor advantage from it. For, saith the Lord, upon the land of the daughter of my people will come up nothing but briers and thorns, until the Holy Ghost be poured down from on high. Amidst all your professions and performances, you will be as dry bones in the valley of vision, without his breathing on you. Let us therefore cry with the Prophet; Come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon us slain, that we may live.

S E R M O N XIX.

ON THE DECEITFULNESS OF THE HEART, WITH RESPECT TO THE OMISSION OF DUTY.

PSALM lxxviii. 56, 57.

— And kept not his testimonies ; but turned back, and dealt unfaithfully like their fathers ; they were turned aside like a deceitful bow.

WHEN the heart of Pharaoh in some degree relented, under the weight of the judgments which God brought on him for his obduracy, he called Moses, and said to him ; Go ye, and serve the Lord ; only let your flocks and your herds be stayed. But Moses replied ; Our cattle also shall go with us ; there shall not an hoof be left behind ; for thereof must we take to serve the Lord our God.* The deceitful heart, when it pretends to comply with the call to duties, is always for abridging them, for limiting them in this or that manner, or for a substitution of one in the place of another ; and cannot consent to a full and entire service of God. If we engage in one duty, it suggests that we may easily pass over another ; if we perform one part of a duty, that we may rest satisfied with this, and omit the other parts of it. But, depending on divine strength, we must reply to the deceits of the heart, as Moses did to Pharaoh ; There

VOL. I.

Y y

shall

* Exod. x. 24,—26.

shall not an hoof be left behind, for thus must we serve the Lord our God.

IN the foregoing discourse we have considered the deceitfulness of the heart in regard to the performance of duty ; we are now,

Secondly, To take a view of it with respect to omission.

I. THE heart urges the delay of duty, and thus discovers its deceitfulness, by promising a future opportunity. Many a sinner is altogether ruined, and many a faint loses much progress and comfort in religion, through delays. When a person discovers by Word or Providence, that he is called to a particular duty ; when conscience, or the motions of the Holy Spirit powerfully second this call, and illustrate the urgency of it ; the great aim of Satan, and of the corrupt heart, working in concert, is to procure a delay. Often when the call is loud and urgent, they endeavour to avert its force, and to turn aside the current of conviction, by insinuating that another time will be more proper. Thus, when God commanded those who had returned from captivity, to rebuild the temple, they said ; *The time is not come, the time that the Lord's house should be built. But we may be assured, that when the heart, in opposition to the calls of Word or Providence, to the testimony of conscience, or the Spirit of God, urges the delay of duty, it is with a secret design to neglect it altogether. In this case, many objections will be made to the seasonableness of the present opportunity. Obstacles will be powerfully pleaded as of the greatest importance, when opposing the service of God, which would be treated with indifference or contempt, did they oppose the fulfilment of any temporal engagement. Those things will appear as insurmountable difficulties, which are unworthy of the smallest consideration. The spiritual, as well as the natural sluggard, still saith ; There is a lion without, I shall be slain in the streets †. There are two things with regard to duty, duty, which ought always to be viewed in connection. There is the duty itself, and its season. We are not to rest satisfied in the mere performance.— We ought also duly to consider the proper time.— There are some things of perpetual obligation, without regard to time or circumstances. Others are only incumbent, if observed in their proper place and season. They cease to be duties, and may rather be viewed as sins, if we engage in them without regard to the appointed order. The observation of the Sabbath is a duty incumbent on all; but it is limited to the first day of the week. Were we to remove it from this, and pretend to observe it on any other day; instead of being an acceptable service, it would be a sin aggravated by the most dreadful presumption. Reproof is an unquestionable duty; Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart, thou shalt in any wise reprove thy brother, thou shalt not suffer sin upon him. But to give it in such a manner, or at such a time, as that it could only tend to exasperate, would be to cast pearls before swine.

* Hag. i. 2.

† Prov. xxii. 13.

THERE are duties of another kind, which though they still retain their nature, and are always necessary, are most suitable when the proper season is considered. Thus, fasting, thanksgiving and solemn vowing, are more peculiarly incumbent in some seasons than in others. Now, it is exceedingly necessary to consider the proper place of every duty, that one may not interfere with another; that one less immediately necessary may not jumble out another; to which there is an immediate call, and that all may be observed in their proper order and connection. *God hath made every thing beautiful in his time. Many duties, though they do not lose their obligation, lose much of their beauty, and of their usefulness also, when the proper time is neglected. The treacherous heart, if it cannot get them altogether avoided, is still for misplacing them. Thus, it often prevents their blessed fruits. It still wishes to invert God's order. The Israelites

* Eccl. iii. 11.

Israelites would not enter into the promised land, when God commanded them: but afterwards, when he had assured them that they should fall in the wilderness, they said; *We will go up unto the place which the Lord hath promised. Saul would not wait till Samuel came, but offered a burnt-offering at his own hand †. The Lord's people will frequently find, that when they have delayed duty beyond the proper time, he withdraws his presence, and suffers them to drag through it with little or no comfort; as a chastisement for their negligence, and to teach them to be more conscientious, and more attentive to the proper season. But the neglect of the proper season, is by no means to be improved as an excuse for the total omission of duty; if it be of such a nature as to be incumbent at all times. For it is far better to observe it, although the best opportunity has been slipped, than to neglect both the season and the duty. In order to evade the call of God, the heart often urges a commutation of duties. It pleads the expediency of performing one instead of another. It was for a sacrilegious act of this kind, that Saul was rejected of God. Although he had received an express command to destroy every thing belonging to the Amalekites, he spared the best of the sheep, and of the oxen, to sacrifice unto the Lord. But Samuel said; Hath the Lord as great delight in burnt-offerings and sacrifices, as in obeying the voice of the Lord? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice; and to hearken, than the fat of rams ‡.

2. It persuades us to omit duty by calling in the world to its aid. This is a faithful ally to the corrupt heart, and is always willing to lend its aid in turning us away from God. That love to this world, which is to be found even in believers, is a great hinderance to them in many duties, we may say indeed, in all. For the world will either so far prevail, as entirely to prevent the observation of duty; or by its influence in distracting the heart, will be in some degree successful

* Num. xiv. 40.—45. † 1 Sam. xiii. 9. ‡ 1 Sam. xv. 15.—22.

cessful in hindering the Christian from performing it aright. When God and conscience call to duty, the heart will reply; "Is this the way in which we are to provide for our families? Must we suffer them to starve, and call this religion? Can we suppose, that God requires men to neglect their natural support, under the pretence of serving him? Shall we imagine that, as the object of worship, he can act inconsistently with himself, as the Creator and Preserver of men? We allow that he is justly entitled to our adoration; but can we think that he requires it, when it interferes with our natural subsistence?" The deceitful heart will also apply the injunction of the Spirit of God; Be—not slothful in business, as if it were not to be understood in connection with the preceding command with respect to fergency in spirit. This is always one of the stratagems of the heart, to darken the mind as to the proper medium which God has pointed out in every thing relating to his service. At one time, it will insinuate to a professor that he ought to devote himself to religion altogether, and to leave his own support, or that of his family entirely to Providence: that it may bring a scandal on the ways of God; convert the professor into a busy body; make way for its own operations under the mask of zeal; wean him gradually from those duties in which the life of godliness eminently consists; or perhaps, by and by, give him a thorough distaste at the whole of religion. Thus, it contradicts the command of the inspired Apostle; *Now, them that are such,—who walk among you disorderly, working not at all, but are busy-bodies,—we command, and exhort by our Lord Jesus Christ, that with quietness they work, and eat their own bread. At another time, as we have seen, it will attempt to divert a person from commanded duty, by alleging that the calls of the world ought rather to be obeyed, and that we are only to attend to religion, when we have nothing else to employ us. This is a great discovery of its deceitfulness and opposition to God; for he requires us to keep every thing in its proper place. While he teacheth us, that we are not so to neglect our callings, as to distress our families; he, at the same time, represents attention to business only as a secondary duty. While he declares, that he who provideth not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel *; he also commands us to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness; promising, and calling us to believe, that all other things shall be added. He enjoins us to set our affections on the things that are above, to labour for the meat that perisheth not, to glorify him, whatsoever we do; and thus to carry religion into the whole of our conduct; by the union of diligence in business and fervency of spirit, to serve the Lord; and by the singleness of our eye, and spirituality of our affections, to sanctify and ennoble even the common actions of life.

is

* 2 Theff. iii. 11, 12.

THE deceitful heart will find no difficulty from the world, no obstacle arising from business, when there is a call to agreeable company, or to a favourite amusement. It will suffer you to consume as much time as you please in eating and drinking, in conversation or recreation. But it can find none for God, for secret or family religion, for prayer or spiritual conference with fellow-christians. How is it that your worldly concerns are always in danger, when God calls for your service; but you see none, when your companions call you, though you spend not only your time, but your substance with them; though you are not only relaxed from work, but have the cup of temptation in your hand? Whence does this proceed, but from the deceitfulness of your heart, that always wishes to keep at a distance from the service of God? Does not this conduct discover the great prevalence of unbelief? You will not trust him with your temporal interests; though he hath declared, that they, who truly seek him, shall want no good thing.

* 1 Tim. v. 8.

thing. You tremble for every moment that you spend in his service through the week, lest it hurt your business, lest it ruin you and bring you to bankruptcy; although he hath assured you, that his bleſſing maketh rich, and that therewith he addeth no sorrow. Do you not believe, that the blessing of God can amply reimburse your small expence of time in serving him; and that his curse can entirely defeat the success of your business, when you make it a plea for resisting his call? You have good reason, at least, for believing this. For the curse of the Lord shall enter into the house of the wicked, *and it shall remain in the midst of his house, and shall consume it with the timber thereof, and the stones thereof. What can you expect, but that his curse should attend your temporal mercies, and blast the fruit of your labours; when you wilfully neglect duty on this account? Know you not that the time, which ought to be devoted to God, in every stated duty, and which you sacrilegiously refuse, is not yours, but his? It is claimed by the Lord of your time. If you, therefore, refuse it to him, you are chargeable with robbing God. A most dreadful crime indeed! You do not deny him what is yours, but what is his own. Listen to his declaration to this purpose; Will a man rob God? Alas! It is no uncommon thing to see men robbing one another, carrying away the property of others by oppression or extortion, nay, by open rapine and violence. But bad as human nature is, can we really suppose that it has proceeded to such a pitch of wickedness, as that violence should be done to God himself? Yes; even this is a species of violence no less common than the other, though far less wondered at:—*yet ye have robbed me: but ye say, Wherein have we robbed thee? In tithes and in offerings. Ye are cursed with a curse; for ye have robbed me, even this whole nation. You rob God, when you deny him those duties which he hath commanded, and that time which he hath

* Zech. v. 4.

† Mal. iii. 8, 9.

hath allotted for the performance of them, and which he justly claims as his tithes and offerings.

3. IT presents evil in opposition to present duty. Every believer has a division in all the powers of his soul. There is in each faculty one principle for God, and another for sin. The understanding is partly light in the Lord, and partly in darkness. The will is in part subjected to the law of God, and in part to that of sin. The affections are only partially renewed. Sin hath still a powerful interest in them. Therefore, the Christian would sometimes appear to have two faculties of the same kind, opposite to each other; to have one mind warring against another, one will struggling against a contrary will; because of the war carried on between the opposite principles of grace and corruption, in every faculty of the soul. His heart, as renewed, is indeed inclined to God in a supreme degree; yet viewed as deceitful, it is still inclined to sin. There is a principle of grace implanted in every power. But it nowise alters the nature of remaining corruption. Sin, as far as it dwells in him, is as much inclined to break forth as ever. Therefore, although he delights in the law of the Lord after the inward man, and loves God with the heart, and with all the heart, with respect to the superlative nature of his affection; yet his heart, as far as it is unrenewed, still continues to work in the way of deceit. So, when he has a call to duty, and finds a spiritual inclination to it; his heart, according to the strength of its deceitfulness, presents evil in opposition to the good which he wishes to do. Thus, Paul, speaking of his experience as a converted person, declares; *I find then a law, that when I would do good, evil is present with me. He testifies that evil was present with him. It lay near him; not like an object, naturally at a distance, brought in upon him; but as denoting something in union with himself. He calls this a law, not as if he meant that evil or sin had an absolute solute dominion over him ; but as signifying that the remaining corruption of his heart acted after the manner of a law, by prescribing a rule for his conduct ; by enforcing this with motives suited to his corruption, proposing carnal pleasures as its rewards, and a privation of these, with worldly sufferings, as its punishments ; a law being sometimes recommended by the former, and always fenced by the latter ; nay, by often compelling him to a present submission,—leading into captivity. The Apostle found this law, that when he would do good, evil was present. Every believer will find the same. His heart may give him some rest, when he has no immediate call to duty ; but when he hath, and is about to obey it, he may expect a renewed assault. The evil of the heart always appears with greatest violence, when there is an operative inclination in the renewed part to the service of God. When God presents an opportunity of serving him, to which the renewed will consents, the deceitfulness of the heart offers a temptation to evil ; and by the artfulness or force of the temptation, endeavours to divert the believer from the good that he designs. It may also be observed, that very frequently it attempts to turn him aside from duty, by presenting evil in its nature directly opposite to the good intended. If he sees the necessity of godly sorrow, it will entice to carnal mirth ; and try to turn him aside from the one, by engaging him in the other. If he finds the necessity of the mortification of any particular lust, if he is inclined to it by the motions of the Holy Spirit ; the heart steps in with its corrupt proposals, and perhaps seizes an opportunity of indulging the very lust that he wished to mortify. Does he aim at humility, and endeavour through grace to deny himself ? Even then his perfidious heart excites him to spiritual pride. Does he endeavour to attain spirituality of affections, to have them fixed on God as his exceeding joy ? Then the flesh is brought in with its corrupt motions and affections ; and he is in-fligated to make provision for it, to fulfil the lusts thereof.

* Rom. vii. 21.

4. It dissuades from duty, because of insufficiency for performing it aright. The deceitful heart will often contradict itself, rather than fail of its intention, to baffle all the attempts of the believer in the service of his God. If engaged in duty, it persuades him to depend on his own strength. If he be convinced of the folly of this proposal, it will try to hinder him from duty, because of felt inability. It speaks the truth indeed, when asserting his utter insufficiency of himself. But if it assume the appearance of an advocate for God, if it transform itself into an angel of light; it is only to serve the interests of the kingdom of darkness, by altogether discouraging the Christian from obedience. While it endeavours to depress him with a sense of his emptiness, it conceals from his view the fulness that is in Jesus his Covenant-head, for qualifying him for every work to which he is called; or strives to prevent his application to this inexhaustible treasury. He is, in a spiritual sense, in the same situation with the servant of that man of God, Elishah, who could only perceive the hosts that compassed the city with horses and chariots, and is ready to say with him; Alas! how shall we do? while he cannot see that there are more with him than all that are against him*. Even when he hath some conviction of that all-sufficiency which is in Christ, his own deceitfulness so far prevails, as to make him distrust the communication of it to him. He views himself as so unworthy, that he can lay no claim to it. Or, he considers the exercise of faith in deriving supplies from this quarter, as so difficult, that rather than engage in it, he will neglect the duty. He finds that his heart is nowise disposed to appropriate this fulness; and he makes this an excuse for omitting the duty required: as the young man David cast off the armour of Saul, because it did not fit him. But this may easily be known to the Lord's people as a device of

* 2 Kings vi. 15. 16.

of their corrupt hearts, or of Satan, to turn them aside from duty. It is, indeed, the work of God to convince his people of their inability to perform any duty; but he never does so with a design to make them resist the call; but, on the contrary, to increase their spiritual diligence in coming to him for all that strength which they need, and which he hath graciously promised. The Psalmist had a deep sense of his own weakness. But faith was his support. I had fainted, unless I had believed to see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living. From his own experience, therefore, and by the Spirit of inspiration, he calls others to the same exercise of dependence on the Lord, amidst the greatest sense of weakness, and the most violent temptations to despondency. Wait on the Lord: be of good courage, and he shall strengthen thine heart; wait, I say, upon the Lord *. Against this evil our Lord prescribes the same antidote; Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me †. It is matter of praise, that while sensible that we are not sufficient of ourselves to think any thing as of ourselves, we have the most abundant warrant to add;— but our sufficiency is of God. Here self-denial appears in its greatest beauty and loveliness; when, in consequence of a conviction of our own emptiness, it leads us to that superabundant fulness which is in Christ; when, from a deep conviction of our own inability, we are made to acknowledge that without Christ, we can do nothing, and enabled in the exercise of faith to say, We can do all things through Christ that strengtheneth us. Let none therefore despond under a sense of unfitness for the performance of duty, and neglect it on this account; but rather imitate the exercise of David, when he was in danger of being overcome by sinful dejection: Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God; for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God ‡.

5. IT

* Psal. xxvii. 13, 14.

† John xiv. 1.

‡ Psal. xlii. 11.

5. It prompts the Christian to resist the present call to duty, for want of a proper temper. By this is meant a right disposition of heart, liveness of affections, a present feeling of the comforts of religion. Many excuse their neglect of duty, by pretending that they do not think it incumbent on them, save when they feel their hearts disposed to it; because they would otherwise dishonour God, and receive no comfort in his service. But it is to be feared, that those who habitually neglect Divine worship, when destitute of this pleasant warmth of affections, and who attempt to vindicate their conduct; only present an apology for the reluctance of their hearts to duty itself, and are in a most unlikely way to attain that temper which they expect, or at least, a real disposition of soul for the service of God. To neglect duty, because we do not feel a present glow of affection, discovers the greatest legality, and the grossest ignorance. This is a certain evidence of legality. For such conduct necessarily supposes, that they consider their fervour in duties as the ground of their acceptance. A comfortable warmth of affections, is most desirable, indeed, in the service of the Lord. But it is not essential to acceptable worship. A duty may be performed in the exercise of faith, while no sensible comfort is attained. But wilfully to omit any one for want of this, is to renounce the true foundation of our access to God, which is only through Christ, the Highpriest of our profession, our New Testament altar, that alone can sanctify the gift; and to embrace something in ourselves, either as our warrant for the performance, or as the ground of our hope in regard to the acceptance of our services. This also discovers the greatest ignorance. For it supposes,—either that our disposition for duty proceeds from ourselves, and not from God, that it must be wrought by us, and not in us by his Spirit;—or, that we are to expect his gracious consolations, while we obstinately resist the calls of word and providence.

WE cannot take a more effectual way to prevent the attainment of a suitable disposition for duty, than to neglect the call for want of it: as, on the other hand, the most direct way to obtain liveliness of affection, and the joy of God's salvation in his service, is depending on promised grace, to obey his call. Indeed it is very commendable exercise for persons before they engage in duty, to seek access to the Lord therein; to endeavour to remove their affections from carnal objects, and to set them on the things that are above; and to call to their recollection those considerations, which most naturally tend to fill the soul with spiritual desires. But the omission, or even the delay of present duty, because we find the inefficacy of our endeavours to attain a right temper of mind, is the device of Satan, and of the corrupt heart, to deprive us of all comfort and edification in the way of the Lord. If your hearts be languid and unaffected, to whom should you apply but to God, that he may touch them with a live coal taken from off his altar? If you have no present comfort, can you reasonably look for it in keeping at a distance from the God of all grace, and of all consolation? How can you more reasonably expect his presence than in the exercise of obedience to his commands, amidst all felt inability? When the Church complains of the Lord's absence, and thus earnestly supplicates his return; Oh that thou wouldst rent the heavens, and come down;—she comforts herself by this consideration; *Thou meetest him that rejoiceth, and worketh righteousness; those that remember thee in thy ways. The Lord in mercy meeteth or preventeth them who work righteousness, who endeavour obedience to his commandments, who remember him in his ways; not those who forget him, who omit duty, because they do not experience his gracious presence, who will only remember him in their own ways. Of the same nature is her language elsewhere: Yea, in the way of thy judgments, O Lord, have we waited for thee; the desire of our soul is to thy name, and to the remembrance of thee *. It is in the path of obedience alone, that the Lord's people may expect their necessary supplies from him ; and it is not surprising that these should be denied, when they turn the back, and not the face. It is more glorifying to God, and more edifying to the saints, that they should perform many duties without a sense of his presence, than omit one, because of the want of this.
our

* Isa. lxiv. 1. 5.

6. It dissuades from duty, by representing that an eminent measure of holiness is not necessary to salvation. This is an objection made by the deceitfulness of the heart to frequency in religious services, and especially in those which are extraordinary and occasional. It is extremely averse to intimate communion with God, and to a strict course of holiness. Therefore, when there is a call from God, or an inclination in the renewed part to any exercise, especially if it be out of the ordinary line, it suggests this reflection ; “ That a man may be a real Christian without the performance of such a duty ; that he may be as sure of heaven, though he neglect it.” Thus it attempts to impede the Christian's progress in holiness, by raising obstacles to a life of dependence on the Lord. It reasons with him against a life of faith, as if his own salvation, and not the glory of God, were his highest end ; as if his greatest concern were to get heaven to himself, and he were under no obligation to glorify God on earth. But this objection, as it arises from deceitfulness, is itself very false and delusory. For, though it were true, as the heart falsely represents, that our own salvation were our highest concern ; still, it would be our duty to aim at the highest degree of holiness we could by any means attain, because thus we should have the highest evidence of the certainty of our salvation ; holiness being the clearest proof of a justified state. It is, therefore, our duty, even for making sure our justification, to aim at an eminent measure of holiness.

* Isa. xxvi. 8.

ness. But as the principle on which it proceeds is false, because the glory of God is our highest end ; its reasoning from this principle is doubly deceitful. For holiness is the only way to glorify God, and to attain our own happiness. We can never glorify God, but by a spiritual life ; and the greater our progress, the more instrumental are we in glorifying him. Nay, our very heaven must especially consist in conformity to God ; and if we desire a heaven upon earth, we can only attain it by following holiness, without which no man can see the Lord. It is, therefore, our indispensable duty to press forward towards the mark for the prize, to leave the things that are behind, and reach forth unto those that are before. It is not enough that we, in regeneration, enter in at the strait gate. We must all our life long be engaged in the same exercise. Therefore, saith Christ to his hearers ; Strive to enter in at the strait gate ; for many shall seek to enter in, and shall not be able *. It is worthy of attention, that the word here used is of the same import with that which denotes the agony of our Lord in the garden †. It signifies such a striving as implies the greatest ardour and engagement of soul, a contending against the greatest opposition, a striving in an agony. We are to strive in the same manner, and with such a holy agony of soul in working out our salvation, and in pressing into the kingdom of heaven, as Christ submitted to in the purchase of it. And there is the greatest necessity for this ; because we have the same enemies to oppose us ; Sin, Satan, the World, and Death : though, blessed be God ! if we be in Christ, we have not like him to struggle with divine and infinite wrath, or with these enemies in their full power.—If we listen to this objection of the deceitful heart ; if we neglect any duty, to which we are called or moved by the holy Spirit ; we not only make no advancement in holiness, but we have no present evidence of its reality : because we are destitute of one of its most certain characters. For it operates in a cheerful obedience obedience to the will of our Father. It is also of an universal nature, producing a respect to all his commandments.

* Luke xiii. 24

† Luke xxii. 44.

7. It inclines to the neglect of duty, lest others should construe it as presumption or hypocrisy. Often, when conscience calls the Lord's people to his service, and their hearts as renewed are disposed to it, their inward deceitfulness prevents them, by awakening a fear of proposing or performing it, lest their conduct be liable to misapprehension. The Christian knows so much of his own wickedness, that he is apt to think every one around should know it as well as himself. He perceives so much hypocrisy in every act of worship, that he would not be surprised, though others should conclude him to be an arrant hypocrite. Therefore, when he finds a call, and something like an inclination to duty, he is frequently prevented by a fear, lest others imagine that he is assuming appearances of religion, to the reality of which he is a stranger. Now, what is this but his deceit, endeavouring to turn him aside from God? Does not this display a greater love to his own character, and to the opinion of others, than to the honour and approbation of the Searcher of hearts? When this is of weight enough to deter from duty, is it not a proof, that the fear of man hath, in the mean time, more influence than that of God? That modesty which would hinder us from proposing or performing duty, when there is a present call, is of a bastard kind. It is not Christian humility. Our Lord accounts it an evidence of our being ashamed of him. It is utterly inconsistent with that holy boldness which would make us overlook every consideration in comparison of the glory of God, and be willing rather to have our own reputation trampled in the dust, than that it should be preserved at the expence of one duty that we owe to him. This is a modesty, for which God may be provoked so to chasten his people, as to give them just cause of shame, and to cover their faces with deserved confusion.

WE shall conclude with the following directions,

1. BEWARE of neglecting the season of duty. God's time is always the fittest for his own service. You can be at no loss to know the season of those duties which are of a stated nature. That of others, which are occasional, is to be learned from the word of God, from the calls of providence, from the testimony of conscience, and from the motions of the Spirit in you who are his children. Consider the danger of neglecting any duty in its proper season. At any rate, when you perform it afterwards, it will very probably be at the expence of some other which is more immediately requisite. Perhaps, the Lord may, in just displeasure, deny you the opportunity that you have promised to yourselves: or, if this be not the case, he may deny you the power, or the inclination to embrace it; or, if neither of these be withheld, he may refuse you his gracious presence, in that duty which you have delayed beyond its proper time: as we have seen with respect to the Israelites. For as they would not enter into the promised land, when God commanded them; afterwards, when they would have entered, he refused his permission.

2. Do not plead the world as an excuse for the omission of duty. God hath given you abundance of time to yourselves. To every thing there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven. You may easily accomplish all your worldly business, and yet devote that time to God which he requires. Were you more diligent in redeeming the time, you might consecrate much of it to him, that is spent to no purpose at all, or to the worst of purposes. If you find your hearts habitually or frequently excusing you from duty, because of the cares of the world; you have great reason to fear, that the love of the world is predominant in you, and that the deceitfulness of riches will choke the word, and make it unfruitful. Our Lord represents this as the very excuse that those offered, who were altogether averse to the Gospel-feast. One said I have bought five yoke of oxen, &c. The consequence was, that one went to his farm, and another to his merchandize. And what doth he assign as the reason of this conduct? They made light of it.

3. BE extremely suspicious of every excuse that your heart offers for the neglect of duty. You have great reason to dread, that such excuses proceed from deceitfulness or carnality. Never admit of one without trying it to the utmost. If you are willing to find or admit an excuse, it is a certain evidence of your aversion to the service of God. Sustain no apology, that conscience cannot approve, when it is tried by the word of God. Sustain none, but what you are assured, God will sustain at his impartial tribunal.

4. Quench not the Spirit, when exciting you to duty. This is grieving to the Holy Ghost, by whom you are sealed to the day of redemption. It discovers the highest ingratitude to him, when, notwithstanding all your unworthiness, he doth not cease to be a reprover. It is extremely prejudicial to the interests of religion in your souls. You, who are the subjects of his common operations, may provoke him to depart from you altogether. For it is written: They rebelled, and vexed his holy Spirit, and he was turned to be their enemy. And O! what a dreadful thing is it, to have the Spirit of all grace, the giver of all consolation, the fountain of all true peace, for your enemy? You, who are his own people, his temples, his peculiar charge, may by continuing to grieve him, provoke him to depart for a long time, with respect to sensible manifestations; and in such a manner, that you may never again in this world, enjoy so great a measure of his comforts as you have formerly enjoyed.

5. CARRY ON, in the strength of promised grace, a constant war against the carnality of your hearts, against that opposition, which is in them to duty. Be not discouraged, because, when you would do good, evil is present with you. Is there any one who says, that he never found evil present with him in opposition to good; that his heart, with the greatest, and with universal

universal alacrity, still complies with the service of God? This is a certain evidence of reigning deceit, and of gross ignorance of his state before God. Sin will not always oppose in the same manner, or with the same violence; but it will always in some degree oppose good. If you are strangers to this opposition, it testifies that your corruption takes another channel; that you have taken up your rest in the duties performed, or that nothing but mere natural affection is at work with you; which is the reason that matters go so smoothly on. It is against the Lord's anointed that the wickedness of Saul especially appears. Cain might have lived peaceably, had not his brother been righteous. If sin get a full vent in the channel of self-righteousness, it will make little opposition to duty: for this is a course as natural to it as any other. If religion go no farther than the affections, while the throne of the heart is still reserved for sin; it may seem an easy matter for a man to do the good that he would. While the assault is only made on the out-works, the strong man may seem to be at rest, because he can still keep his goods in peace.

FINALLY, press after an eminent measure of holiness. It is not enough that you are believers. You must seek to apprehend that for which also you are apprehended of Christ; and to grow up into him in all things. Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father who is in heaven is perfect.

S E R M O N XX.

ON THE DECEITFULNESS OF THE HEART, AS INFLUENCING THE CONDUCT IN LIFE.

JAMES i. 22.

But be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves.

FEW are disposed to learn, from the general wickedness of the world, the knowledge of their own hearts. When we suffer from others, when we are ensnared by their devices, and injured in our own characters, or property ; we naturally entertain ideas to the prejudice of those from whom we suffer. We suppose them to be worse than others, and resolve, if possible, to avoid them for the future. But alas ! we do not improve these evidences of deceitfulness in others, by viewing their conduct as a picture of our own hearts, by comparing their deceitful actions with those to which we ourselves have still a great propensity, and which we would certainly perpetrate, were we not restrained by some means or other. We do not resolve more carefully to avoid ourselves. We hate the same things in them, which we love and indulge in ourselves, at least in the principle. Whereas, did we think justly, we would consider their conduct as consonant to our own secret inclinations, and interpret their actions as expressive of the character of our own hearts : for as in water face answereth to face, so the heart of man to man.
OUR

In the first part of this chapter, the Apostle exhorts those to whom he writes to a right improvement of the day of trial, and to a proper deportment, whether their circumstances be prosperous or adverse. From verse 13. to 18. he shows that all evil proceeds from ourselves, and all real good from God. Then, (ver. 19, 20.) he exhorts to meekness of spirit, and to a sincere and humble reception of the word. In verse 22. he shows that it is not enough that we profess to receive the word with our hearts, but that we must discover its influence in our whole conversation : But be ye doers of the word. This expression is of the same meaning with that used verse 25. where he who looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, is said to be not a forgetful bearer, but a doer of the work, and so blessed in his deeds. In both, this character is opposed to mere hearing ;—and not bearers only. That which we at first only bear, we must afterwards do. What comes to us as a word, must go from us as a work. He declares briefly, but very emphatically, the folly of being satisfied with mere hearing ;—deceiving your own selves. Others may not be deceived by this conduct ; for it affords none of those proofs of sincerity which are requisite. But it is often productive of a fatal self-deceit. These words evidently contain this doctrine ; That when the practice is not correspondent with the profession, it discovers the power of self-deceit.

Having already illustrated some of the operations of deceitfulness, with respect to the performance and omission of those duties, which more immediately relate to God, we now propose to consider it a little, as influencing the Conduct in Life.

1. It appears in general, by a strong propensity to abuse those precious truths, which men profess to believe. Many seem to receive the truths of God, only to trample them under foot. This practical error is, perhaps, the most shocking that can be imagined, and the most dangerous also. For men solace themselves with the apprehension of being found in the faith, while they only use the word as the instrument of their iniquity, as a tool for the gratification of their abominable lusts. We might mention various evidences of this mournful abuse of divine truth, which appear in the conduct of many professors. They may all be comprehended in one, which is of great importance,—the abuse of the doctrine of the free grace of God manifested in the whole of our salvation, or as the scripture expresses it, turning the grace of God into lasciviousness. Some, it may be feared, if they profess to believe the absolute sovereignty of Divine grace, in chusing a certain number of mankind lost to eternal life, without any foresight of faith or good works, as meritorious causes, will improve their boasted faith in this doctrine, by concluding that they may live as they please, and indulge themselves in every iniquity: because if God hath decreed their salvation, they cannot fail of attaining it; but if otherwise, whatever they do, they shall be damned. But they do not consider, that God in his decree hath fixed faith and holiness as means, no less absolutely than salvation as the end; that men are chosen to salvation, only through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth; nay, that in the decree, he views holiness not merely as a mean, but as an illustrious part of the end, having chosen us that we should be holy and without blame before him in love.—If they profess to believe justification without works, through the imputed righteousness of Christ, they will wickedly conclude that there is no necessity for holiness or good works, because they have no merit before God; while he hath absolutely declared that without holiness no man shall see the Lord, and that this freedom from condemnation belongs only to those who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. They overlook the indispensable necessity of evangelical holiness, as the only proper evidence of the reality of justification, as adorning the Gospel, glorifying to God, attractive tive to others; as the image of him who is the first-born among many brethren; the evidence of our title to the heavenly inheritance, and our meetness for the full possession of it. If they deny the doctrine of free-will, and assert the necessity of the Spirit to work all our works in us; hence will they impiously infer, that they may be entirely regardless of those very means which God himself hath appointed, and in the due observation of which we are alone warranted to expect the promised blessing. For we are commanded to seek the Lord while he may be found. They will, perhaps, presume to resist, as far as possible, the operations of the holy Spirit, or at least, give themselves no trouble to cherish and improve them; because they know that, when these are saving, they cannot fail of success. The doctrine of the perseverance of the saints will also be abused as an encouragement to the commission of iniquity, because they know that none, who are Christ's, shall eternally perish; though we are assured that they are only kept through faith, and that they are preserved blameless to his heavenly kingdom.
the

THIS conduct is by the Spirit of God esteemed to be an express denial of the faith. And it is the more base and detestable, because it is sheltered under a profession of it. It is accounted a denial of Christ, nay, of the very being of God. Of such speaks the Apostle Jude: There are certain men crept in unawares, who were of old ordained to this condemnation, ungodly men, turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness, and denying the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ *. To reason, and to act in this manner, is really to deny the Lord that bought us †, and to make Christ the minister of sin ‡. Of this abuse of the doctrine of truth, Paul speaks with the greatest abhorrence; Shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound? God forbid. How shall we that are dead to sin, live any longer therein §?

BOO

* Jude ver 4.

† 2 Pet. ii. 1.

‡ Gal. ii. 17.

§ Rom. vi. 1, 2.

BUT as the deceit of the heart infligates some to abuse these precious doctrines in this manner, the same principle takes another course with others. It makes them stagger at the faith, and even reject it, because thus abused. When they see its professed friends sell it at so low a price, it proves to them a stumbling-block, hardens them in their iniquity, and makes them conclude that this accursed conduct is the native result of the doctrines they profess to believe. This the Apostle Peter mentions as a certain effect of the corruption of the truth, which is after godliness. *Many shall follow their pernicious ways, by reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of. Under the influence of this temptation, many have interpreted the word of God in direct opposition to the plain meaning of language; and when conscious that their forced expositions would not stand the test, have dared impiously to declare, that if the penmen of scripture had known how much their modes of expression would have been abused, they would never have employed them. But no one could speak in this strain, did he not secretly disbelieve that these men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. Nor need men be staggered at the abuse of Divine truth in our time; when they know that it was abused in the very same manner, even in the days of the Apostles. They have no more reason for rejecting the doctrine of grace, because some abuse it, than for denying themselves meat and drink, because some are gluttons, and others drunkards. The bee can suck honey from the same flower from which the wasp distils poison. Men abuse these precious doctrines, only because they do not cordially believe them. Were this the case, they would prove the life of their spirits. The same truths, which to some are the savour of life unto life, are to others the savour of death unto death; not merely in the end, but even in the mean time; because their deceitful hearts use them as stumbling-blocks, and through the power of their

* 2 Pet. ii. 2.

their lusts, they thence take occasion to harden themselves more and more in iniquity. Unto the pure all things are pure; but unto them that are defiled, and unbelieving, is nothing pure: but even their mind and conscience is defiled. And indeed this inward defilement is the reason that nothing is pure to them. For it communicates its infection to every thing that approaches it. The natural effect of this defilement of mind and conscience is immediately mentioned: They profess that they know God; but in works they deny him; being abominable and disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate.*

2. It appears by an attempt to reconcile religion and the world. Many professors try to love God and the world at the same time, to please both the one and the other, to make sure of heaven without quitting their hold of earth, to serve both Jehovah and Baal. This charge God exhibits against Israel, in his instructions to the Prophet Ezekiel: They come unto thee as the people cometh, and they sit before thee as my people, and they hear thy words, but they will not do them: for with their mouth they show much love, but their heart goeth after their covetousness †. But this attempt is vain, and a striking evidence of the power of deceit. For it is expressly declared, that if we love the world, or the things of the world, the love of the Father is not in us. Do not flatter yourselves that you can grasp the true riches in the one hand, and retain the mammon of unrighteousness in the other, by dividing your heart between both. The love of the world in its corrupt opinions, in its childish vanities, in its evil customs, in its unsatisfying honours, pleasures, and profits, is represented as a spiritual adultery in professors; because it is a direct apostasy from that God, whom in profession they have chosen as the supreme object of their affections. Ye adulterers and adulteresses, know ye not that the friendship of this world is enmity with God? Whosoever therefore will be a friend of the world is the enemy of God.*. The world itself is an enemy to God; and can you be his friends, while you love his implacable enemy? The world is God's rival. It claims the dominion of the heart. Now, God will be satisfied with nothing less. He commands you to love him with all the heart, and with all the soul. But no man can serve two masters, for either he will hate the one, and love the other, or he will hold to the one and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and Mammon†. Hath not Christ given himself for us, that he might deliver us from this present evil world? And can we be interested in his death, without renouncing the love of the world? Is it not the work of the Spirit, by means of the cross, to crucify us to the world? Is it not expressly required of the professed disciples of Christ, as an evidence of their being risen with him, that they seek the things that are above? We have a striking example of the fatal consequences of this vain attempt in the history of Ananias and Sapphira, who, for a warning to professors in all succeeding ages, to beware of the rock on which they were wrecked, were immediately destroyed by the hand of God. Peter, by Divine inspiration, accuses them of having their hearts filled by Satan with deceitfulness against the Holy Ghost. He said unto Ananias; Why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie unto the Holy Ghost; or, as the words may be rendered, to deceive the Holy Ghost, to endeavour so impious and fruitless a deceit †? They pretended to sell all their property for the behoof of the Church, and to give the whole of the price to God; while they retained part of it to themselves. Their conduct, amidst all the blaze of their profession, declared that their hearts were still wedded to the world; and not only so, but contained a most daring denial of Divine Omniscience.

* Tit. i. 15, 16.

† Ezek. xxxiii. 31.

3. THE liberty of the tongue in backbiting others, is a farther evidence of the deceitfulness of the heart. This is a sin extremely prevalent among professed Christians.

* James iv. 4.

† Matt. vi. 24.

‡ Acts v. 3.

Christians. What is the bulk of the conversation of many, but a continued detraction from the character of their neighbours? This base practice is directly opposite to all the comforts of society. But, from its prevalence, one would almost be in danger of apprehending, that it was considered as one of the chief pillars of society, and of mutual intercourse among its members. Did we take a just and impartial view of the world around us, we would be apt to think, that men in general had combined to keep no faith one with another; but on the contrary, to surpass even the beasts of prey, by devouring each other, without regard to the sameness of kind. There are always two ingredients in this detestable practice,—Malice and Dishonesty. Backbiting evidently discovers a malicious spirit. For it is ever meant to expose the person, against whom it is directed. His faults, either real or supposed, are the mark at which it constantly aims. His good qualities are either passed over in silence; or if they be mentioned, it is but very slightly, or only in such a way, as to detract from them and infuse a doubt of their reality.—Though the good qualities of a person should be far more conspicuous than his failings; yet those are generally considered as less worthy of praise or imitation, than these of reprehension. Often, indeed, it is a secret unpleasant conviction of superior worth, that prompts persons to indulge themselves in the language of backbiting; that thus, if possible, they may bring those, who are the objects of their envy, and perhaps of their fear, more on a level with themselves. For many a one is there, whose eye is evil, because his brother's eye is good. It always implies dishonesty. For if there be any thing in the conduct of another, that gives us offence, that appears dishonouring to God and prejudicial to him, or that includes others in its evil consequences; we ought to make himself acquainted with it, and in meekness and love to deal with him as a brother. The dishonesty of this conduct is a farther evidence of its malicious nature;

for it shows that professors, in publishing the faults of others, do not wish themselves reclaimed, but only their faults propagated. This practice is also a great inlet to lying. For we generally find, that those who delight to dwell on the failings of their neighbours, will invent a falsehood, rather than cease from the language of calumny, or deny themselves the barbarous pleasure of assassinating others in their good name. And slander, when once propalled, is like a stone rolled in snow, which always gathers by its motion. It is seldom or never repeated without aggravation. This is one of those spots that defile Church-members, the origin of which, as being of a more secret nature than many other offences, often in particular instances cannot be discovered by the most diligent inquiry, and therefore cannot be so easily managed as a foundation of censure. To say the truth; and can we say it without sorrow? it is so general, at least in some degree, that we would be at a loss where to begin. It stains the conversation of many, who in other respects walk as becometh saints. Who can wash his hands, and say, in regard to this iniquity, I am clean?

DID we for a moment consider it merely in a rational point of view, we would not hesitate to declare its unreasonableness, or be at any loss to discover its folly. For when we hear those, with whom we have intercourse, indulging themselves in backbiting others, who, perhaps, have but newly left our company, and who have been treated with every mark of friendship; what can we expect, but that we shall be the next butts for the shafts of their malice? Or, when we take a liberty to ourselves in this despicable gratification, is it not natural to suppose that others will retaliate, and use the same freedom with us, that we have used with them? But if we bring this unchristian practice to the unerring standard of God's Word, we shall have a far more striking discovery of its evil and folly. There we find that backbiting is represented as the fruit of a reprobate mind,
and

and that backbiters and whisperers are classed with haters of God. And no wonder, for they are haters of man, who is the image of God. Envy and malignity are joined with murder. Indeed, they are the murders of the heart: *Being full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity. It is given as a negative character of the man who shall dwell in God's tabernacle, that he backbiteth not with his tongue, nor doth evil to his neighbour, nor taketh up a reproach against his neighbour †. On the contrary, the character, conduct, and danger of the wicked are described in the following address: Thou givest thy mouth to evil, and thy tongue frameth deceit; thou sittest and speakest against thy brother, thou slanderest thine own mother's son.—Now, consider this, ye that forget God, lest I tear you in pieces, and there be none to deliver ‡. Backbiting is also produced in scripture as an evidence of the deceitfulness of the heart; and the habitual commission of this sin, as an undeniable proof of hypocrisy in religion. For it is declared that deceit is in the heart of them that imagine evil §; and that the wicked is snared by the transgression of his lips ||.—It is also said, that an hypocrite with his mouth destroyeth his neighbour. So cruel is calumny, that it carries destruction in it. This is the murder of the tongue, as malice is that of the heart. When men's teeth are spears and arrows, and their tongue a sharp sword, there is every reason to fear that their right hand would also be a right hand of cruelty, did not the Lord restrain the remainder of their wrath. An habit of this kind, is, in the context, mentioned by our Apostle, as an unquestionable evidence of the falsity of a profession: *If any man among you seem to be religious, and bridletb not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain.

4. THE deceitfulness of the heart is manifested by the prevalence of diffimulation and falsehood. A great part of conversation, especially among those in higher ranks

* Rom. i. 28,—30. † Psal. xv. 1,—3, ‡ Psal. l. 19,—22.

§ Prov. xii. 20. || Prov. xii. 13.  James i. 26.

ranks in life, consists of professions which are entirely insincere. Men, for establishing their characters, or serving their interests, often pretend the greatest esteem and affection, where there is naught but disgust and alienation. It can never be inconsistent with the character of a Christian to endeavour a kind and gentle demeanour towards all, while that injunction of the Spirit is contained in his word; Be courteous. But this is the great error. Men often make professions to which they are altogether strangers, nay, even while actuated by feelings directly contrary, and while regardless of that important command; Let love be without dissimulation. If men view it only in a natural respect, there can be nothing more mean and despicable, than, merely for accomplishing their own purposes, to pretend affections which they never felt, and to utter expressions which their inward feelings belie. This is entirely inconsistent with the character of a child of God, of whom it is said, that he speaketh the truth in his heart; and who is bound constantly to imitate the example of Jesus, in whose lips there was no guile. The deceitfulness of the heart often seeks a vent to itself in the language of flattery. This consists in bestowing false praise, or in ascribing perfections to others, which we do not believe they possess. This is always an evidence of a double heart. Therefore saith the wise man; *He that goeth about as a talebearer revealeth secrets; therefore meddle not with him that flattereth with his lips. The plain meaning of this injunction is;—"A talebearer tries to ingratiate himself with you, by telling you the secrets of another, that he may lay your heart open: while discommending him he praises you, that he may gain your confidence. But he is to be avoided, for he seeks your confidence, only that he may have it in his power to treat you in the same manner. He will as readily reveal your secrets as those of another." A man that flattereth his neighbour, spreadeth a net for his feet.—He that hateth, dissembleth

* Prov. xx. 19.

bleth with his lips, and layeth up deceit within him. When he speaketh fair, believe him not: for there are seven abominations in his heart. Whose hatred is covered by deceit, his wickedness shall be shewed before the whole congregation.—A lying tongue hateth those that are afflicted by it, and a flattering mouth worketh ruin.*

Lying is a vice mournfully prevalent, and a striking evidence of the deceit of the heart. It is too common for men to cover one sin by another; to tell a lie that they may conceal some other transgression. Their temptation to this, is a sense of shame, arising from the commission of sin, or a fear of suffering from men like themselves. But it is a dreadful aggravation of their guilt, and a confirming proof of the hardness of their hearts under sin. Besides, it generally defeats its own intention. For few are so obdurate, as not to discover their guilt, one way or another, by the very means which they take to conceal it; either by their want of ingenuity, or by their confusion. This also declares that they are presently destitute of a sense of the omniscience of God, as all their concern is, how they may hide their guilt from man; and that they are impenitent under the load of iniquity; for there can be no true repentance before God, while persons endeavour to conceal their guilt from others, by adding sin to sin. This iniquity is extremely dishonouring to God. For it is a denial of his nature, as the only true God, the God who cannot lie; and particularly of his attribute of omniscience, as the Searcher of hearts. It is extremely dangerous to souls. For, as we have seen, when persisted in, it precludes the possibility of repentance, and hardens the sinner in the commission of iniquity. For whoso covereth his sin shall not prosper. It is exceedingly prejudicial to society; because it looses the bonds of union by which men are knit to each other, one of the most powerful of which is mutual faith. It is directly opposite to the character of God's people; for they are children that will

* Prov. xxvi. 24,—28.

*will not lie. The Apostle Paul uses a very strong argument against this detestable practice, taken from its inconsistency with the renewed nature of believers: Lie not one to another, seeing that ye have put off the old man with his deeds, and have put on the new man †. With respect to persons of this character, there is no exception as to their exclusion from the kingdom of God. For all liars shall have their part in the lake, that burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death ‡. All who go on in a course of this kind, in a peculiar manner claim their relation to Satan; for he is a liar, and the father of it §.

5. This corrupt principle breaks out in the life by dishonesty in civil transactions. It were scarcely necessary to speak of the literal transgression of the eighth precept of the Divine law, because it is so obvious as to require little illustration; did not many discover the power of their deceit, by supposing that the crime is proportioned to the magnitude of the injury done to others. They judge of the degree of sin, according to the value of what is stolen. But this is altogether a false rule. He is as truly a thief in God's account, who steals a penny, as he who steals a pound. And why so? Because the one is no more his property than the other. Perhaps, it may be said, that it is safer to steal a trifle than a great matter. For the temptation is less, and the baseness or wickedness of heart, manifested in the commission of any crime, is certainly greater in proportion to the weakness of the temptation. He, who steals a mere trifle, is surely possessed of a very dishonest mind; because the thing stolen can do him very little service. So deceitful is the heart, that many imagine there is little harm in a petty theft. But if the thing be the property of another, it does not signify what it is. Thou art not only forbidden to covet thy neighbour's house or wife, ox or ass, but any thing that is thy neighbour's. God hath not said; Thou shalt not steal this or that; but absolutely, olutely, Thou shalt not steal. Necessity is no plea. For every thief will plead some kind of necessity. No man would steal, if he did not think that he had occasion for what he covets. Work more diligently, and you will find no need for dishonest courses. The time spent in devising and executing your plans of petty theft, would very probably bring you in as much by lawful industry. Let him that stole, steal no more; but rather let him labour, working with his hands the thing which is good, that he may have to give to him that needeth *. This is the way not only to supply your own necessities, but to be able to relieve those of others. Besides, you cannot get the good of what you have by dishonesty. You can neither confidently ask, nor expect the blessing to attend it. The curse of the Lord shall enter into the house of the thief, and it shall remain in the midst of his house, and shall consume it, with the timber thereof, and the stones thereof †. It is indeed said, Men do not despise a thief, if he steal to satisfy his soul when he is hungry ‡. Hence some may urge the plea of necessity. But there can be no necessity for stealing, when a man is able to work, or when he can beg. Begging is far more honourable than stealing. But it must be observed, that these words do not relate to theft in the estimation of God, but only in that of man. It is not said, that a man is not a thief, that God doth not account him so; or even that men do not form this judgment of him; but only, that in the case supposed, they do not despise him. That is, he is rather pitied, when his straits are so great, that he is overcome by a temptation to theft, merely to satisfy the resistless cravings of nature. Nor is it said, that he does not merit punishment. For, it is added, If he be found, he shall restore seven-fold, he shall give all the substance of his house. These words are not spoken to extenuate the guilt of theft, but to aggravate that of adultery; as shewing that it is a more heinous sin than theft; because the man, who steals to satisfy his

* Isa. lxiii. 8. † Col. iii. 9, 10. ‡ Rev. xxi. 8. § John viii. 44.

VOL. I.

C c c hunger,

* Eph. iv. 28.

† Zech. v. 4.

‡ Prov. vi. 30.

hunger, yields to a temptation for the gratification of a natural, sinful appetite ; but he who commits adultery, invades the property of his neighbour to satisfy a brutish, abominable lust.

BUT in how many different ways does the deceitfulness of the heart appear, even while men do not absolutely put forth the hand to steal? How many, in trade, use false weights and measures, to defraud their neighbours, and procure wealth ; and yet flatter themselves, as if they were innocent before God? *Ephraim is a merchant, the balances of deceit are in his hand : he loveth to oppress. And Ephraim said. Yet I am become rich, I have found me out substance : in all my labours they shall find none iniquity in me, that were sin. But the false balance, or, the balance of deceit, is abomination to the Lord. Many, in buying and selling, take the advantage of those who are ignorant. It is naught, it is naught, saith the buyer, it is a thing of no value ; but when he goeth his way he boasteth. As a cage is full of birds, so are their houses full of deceit ; therefore they are become great, and waxen rich †. Often are the poor and fatherless the prey of the deceitful, who grind their faces, and rob them of their substance. The people of the land have used oppression, or, as it may be read, deceit,—they have vexed the poor and needy ; yea, they have oppressed the stranger wrongfully ‡. Many instances of the same kind might be mentioned ;—not restoring what has been lost, or using proper means to discover the rightful owner ;—borrowing without an intention to pay, retaining what has been borrowed, when it may be thought that the owner has forgot, or refusing to repay, when one has ability ; all which are actions of dishonesty, and fruits of inward deceitfulness. But these we cannot now particularly illustrate.

6. IN a word, what is the history of mankind but a history of the deceitfulness of the heart in its unspeakable variety of forms? Whether we view it on a larger, or on a smaller scale, it in general presents the same same mournful picture. The conduct of individuals is just a miniature of that of greater bodies. Here, we see private persons deceiving, biting and devouring one another: There, we see whole communities mutually devising the most habile schemes of deceit, for infringing the most sacred obligations, for depriving each other of property, of credit, or of that idol honour, that Moloch which hath so often had its altars drenched with human blood. Here, we see individuals professing the greatest friendship and affection, while they eagerly wait an opportunity of blasting the characters of others. *If he comes to see me, saith David of an enemy under the mask of friendship, he speaketh vanity; his heart gathereth iniquity to itself, when he goeth abroad he telleth it: and again; The words of his mouth were smoother than butter, but war was in his heart: his words were softer than oil, yet they were drawn swords †. There, we see nations, again and again, making the warmest protestations of peace, while secretly straining all the sinews of war. Often is a credulous nation reduced to the same situation with Edom: All the men of thy confederacy have brought thee to the border: the men that were at peace with thee, have deceived thee, and prevailed against thee: they that eat thy bread have laid a wound under thee ‡. You may hear individuals vindicating themselves in the most solemn manner before God and the world, while they only lie in wait privily to slay the innocent; and, in like manner, collective bodies making the most awful appeals with respect to the uprightness of their intentions, to the Judge of all, as well as to the nations around; and specifying instances, almost innumerable, of injurious treatment which they pretend to have received; while their sole intentions are to blind others, whom it is their interest to retain in a state of amity, and to destroy or subdue those, who, perhaps, so far from being the aggressors, have been the only sufferers. On the one hand, you may perceive a cruel and insidious

* Hof. xii. 7.

† Jer. v. 27.

‡ Ezek. xxii. 29.

Joab

* Psal. xli. 6.

† Psal. lv. 21.

‡ Obad. ver. 7.

Joab taking an unsuspecting Amasa by the beard, saluting him, and saying, Art thou in health, my brother? while he smites him to the heart *: on the other, a deceitful prince entering peaceably even upon the fattest places of the province, and scattering the prey, and spoil, and riches; and forecasting his devices against the strong holds †. Indeed, when the heart is full of deceit and deceit, it is no wonder that it should also be full of envy and murder ‡. As wars and fightings in general proceed from lust, the most of those between different powers more immediately originate from that of deceit. It is because the greatest part of princes, like him mentioned in Daniel, after the league work deceitfully, that the blood of their unhappy people is made to run like water on the streets. Of this corruption it may be said, as of mystical Babylon, that in her skirts is found all the blood shed upon the earth: and as this bale principle naturally issues in blood, God, in righteous judgment, punishes it in this way. Thus he threatens concerning the treacherous king of Judah, who broke covenant with the king of Babylon; As I live, surely mine oath that he hath despised, and my covenant that he hath broken, even it will I recompense upon his own head:—and all his fugitives, with all his bands, shall fall by the sword, and they that remain shall be scattered towards all winds §.

WE shall only improve this branch of our subject by warning you all against backbiting. It is a mournful truth that this evil greatly prevails among professors. Nay, there is too just ground to assert, that it prevails more generally among them, than even among the profane. Now, it may not be altogether improper to enquire, what may be some of the reasons of a fact apparently so incredible?—Sin, in professors, often takes a more secret channel, than what it occupies in those who are without, or that in which it flowed in themselves, while they made no profession. Regard to character or interest lays them under

* Sam. xx. 9, 10.

† Dan. xi. 24.

‡ Rom. i. 29.

§ Ezek. xvii. 19. 21.

under a necessity of guarding against the grosser pollutions of the world. Perhaps, they confide in their profession and external reformation. But sin, like a torrent confined in one place, must break out in another. It still retains the dominion in their hearts: and if it find no vent by the lusts of the flesh, it withdraws into the more secret channel of the lusts of the mind, such as pride, malice, envy, and the like. Now, malice and envy break out in evil-speaking and backbiting. But the profane person hath not his lusts so hemmed in; and his manner of life most naturally leads him to an indulgence of the lusts of the flesh, rather than of those of the mind. At any rate, the fountain of sin in the heart is more divided.—This iniquity may be found greatly to prevail even with real Christians. They mortify the deeds of the body. But their attention is often too much confined to those sins that tend most to defile the conversation; especially when languid in the exercise of grace. Undoubtedly, as far as this sin prevails, as far as it remains unmortified, they are defective in the evidences of true religion: and wherever it is habitual, as really as any other sin, it will prevent admission into the kingdom of God*.

PROFESSORS pacify their consciences by supposing that backbiting is comparatively a little sin. They in their minds run the parallel between this and their former iniquities: and are at no loss to conclude that this is scarcely worth the mentioning. When a man sits and speaks against his brother, he thinks that God will approve his sin †. But the comparison of sins is a very delicate subject. All sin is infinitely evil, objectively considered. And perhaps, some of the lusts of the mind, though reckoned far less heinous than those of the flesh, may be no less so in the estimation of that God, whose thoughts are not our thoughts. This we know, that whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer, and abideth in death; and that the sins proceeding from the lusts of the mind are,

* Gal. v. 21.

† Psal. l. 20, 21.

are, by the Spirit, marked down in the same criminal list with those of the flesh, as *worthy of death.

AGAIN, from the peculiar obligations that professing Christians lie under to the exercise of brotherly love, the want of this grace may occasion a greater prevalence of backbiting. Wherever this prevails, indeed, it must be owing to the want of love. But in those situations in life, wherein any duty is peculiarly requisite, if it be neglected, the contrary sin generally occupies its place. For example, in the married life, if love subsist not between the parties, there is commonly aversion. Now, love to one another is more especially incumbent on fellow Christians than others. They are bound by the strongest ties. In profession they are members of one body; they all eat the same spiritual meat, and drink the same spiritual drink. And if there be a defect in regard to this holy affection, there is every reason to apprehend, that the contrary will fill up its room. The law hath an irritating power on the lusts of men, and if their hearts are not really subjected to its authority in any precept, their enmity breaks out by a peculiar opposition to it. For sin, taking occasion by the commandment, works in them all manner of concupiscence: and the less that the authority of the law is felt in any article, the more does sin seem to be dead †. Matters must necessarily take this course, according to the frame of the heart, and according to the nature of sin and duty. There can be no vacuity in the soul. All that room, which is not occupied by grace, must be possessed by sin. All in the heart, that is not love, is really enmity.

FARTHER, the uncommon prevalence of this sin among professors may be partly owing to the abuse of gifts. These, as far as they are un sanctified, minister fuel to the natural pride of the heart. Knowledge puffeth up. As pride in every shape is attended with great meanness, the pride of superior gifts may dispose dispose a person tacitly to compare himself with others, to show his own imagined superiority by the liberal use of his tongue in defaming their characters. To a conduct somewhat like this the Apostle refers, when he saith ; *For we dare not make ourselves of the number, or compare ourselves with some that commend themselves ; but they, measuring themselves by themselves, and comparing themselves amongst themselves, are not wise. Nay, a consciousness of inferiority to others may produce this conduct. Thus they wish to bring others more to an equality.

* Rom. i. 27.—31.

† Rom. vii. 8.

BESIDES, false zeal may have the same effect. This often creates a spirit of censure and severity. Those who know the necessity of purity of communion, sometimes suffer their zeal to degenerate into bitterness. They discover that it is false ; for instead of directing it toward the beam in their own eye, they are principally concerned about the mote in their brother's. They farther manifest its hypocritical nature ; because it does not excite them to use proper means for reforming what is pretended to be offensive. For they do not rebuke their brother. They suffer sin upon him. All the means used by them tend to the destruction of his character, and not to the reformation of his practice. When there is nothing more than a mere profession, or when religion is at a very low ebb ; both the heart and practice are apt to speak the same language with that of the carnal Jews ; Stand by thyself, come not near to me, for I am holier than thou.

IN a word, this sin is indulged rather than those that are more gross, because it is often more difficult of discovery. Many things are spoken in hints and whispers, which are not easily traced ; though they frequently wound more deeply than the heaviest charges of a direct kind, because they leave ground to suspect, that the matter may be worse than it is represented, nay, that it may be a great deal worse than it really is. Thus professors, while indulging this sin, are less afraid of church-discipline. And perhaps, the

* 2 Cor. x. 12.

the relaxation of this, in too many instances, with regard to evil-speaking, gives too much encouragement to it ; as professors, being suffered to pass with impunity, are apt to conclude that the offence is trivial. But let us be concerned, under a deep sense of the highest authority, and depending on the strength of divine grace, to lay aside all malice, and all guile, and all hypocrisies, and envies, and all evil-speakings ; to speak evil of no man without a proper call ; and to obey that great commandment, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.

S E R-

S E R M O N XXI.

ON THE DECEITFULNESS OF THE HEART, IN THE ABUSE OF PROSPERITY.

JEREMIAH xlix. 16.

Thy terribleſs hath deceived thee, and the pride of thine heart.

THE providence of God is a blessed, and a divine commentary on the Word, which all his people, according to the measure of grace given to them, will be concerned to read, search into and understand by the light of the holy Spirit, who alone can lead into all truth. It is especially a commentary on the promises, whether they relate to the prosperity or adversity of God's children. From an attentive observation of providential dispensations, a comparison of these with the promises and declarations of scripture, and a diligent consideration of the work of the Spirit in their hearts, as concurring with both; they receive the most convincing, satisfying and irrefragable demonstration of the truth of religion,—a demonstration, to which unbelievers are entire strangers; and little known even to many Christians, who are inattentive to the ways of the Lord. The heart employs various methods of deceit, to deprive the children of God of the comfortable and edifying fruits of a proper improvement of divine dispensations; whether these be prosperous or adverse.

THE charge contained in the words of our text is exhibited against Bofrah, the chief city of the land of Edom. According to a common figure, a part of the country is put for the whole. There is a considerable difference among interpreters as to the meaning of the word rendered terribleness, as it nowhere else occurs. But the sense given in our Version seems most agreeable to the context. It denotes the natural strength, the power, and the prosperity of Edom, all in one point of view. Deception is the effect ascribed to this. Thy terriblest hath deceived thee. It produced such a vain confidence, that the Edomites thought they were secure from all danger. But the greatness of Edom's power was not properly the cause of her deceit. It was only the occasion. The cause follows in the words;—and the pride of thine heart. The meaning plainly is, that from outward strength and apparent security, the pride of her heart took occasion to deceive her into false confidence. The words themselves may be rendered, By thy terriblest thy proud heart hath deceived thee. They express the natural effect of riches, power, abundance, or prosperity of any kind on the carnal heart. These excite its pride, and tend to carry it away from God the only refuge.

THE words afford us the following doctrine,

THAT worldly prosperity is often abused by the heart, as the occasion of self-deceit; or, that the heart often discovers its deceit in the abuse of prosperity.

ALL that is intended here, is to illustrate the actions of this corrupt principle in abusing prosperity. It does so,

1. By ingratitude. Sinners receive all God's mercies with an unthankful heart. All that he graciously confers, they consider as justly belonging to them; and were it withheld, they would accuse him of denying what they can claim as their own. She did not know, saith the Lord, concerning the Church of Israel, *that I gave her corn, and wine, and oil, and multiplied her silver and gold. Although it is from God that sinners receive their food and raiment, their preservation preservation from day to day, their health, strength and many deliverances; yet they acknowledge not the Giver. Multitudes, who live on Divine bounty, live as unthankfully as the beasts of the field. They sit down to their table and rise from it, they eat and drink like the brutes that perish; without considering, that whether they eat or drink, or whatsoever they do, they should do all to the glory of God. Yea, they are more unthankful than the beasts of the field. Even these discover a sense of gratitude to their benefactors. The savage lion will be tamed by the kindness of his keeper. Therefore, the Lord, by a beautiful figure, summons in the brute creatures as witnesses against his professing people, with respect to their ignorance, ingratitude and rebellion; and the inanimate creatures, as judges of his controversy with them. *Hear O heavens, and give ear, O earth: for the Lord hath spoken: I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me. The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib: but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider. Perhaps, it was such an abuse of mercies as this, that holy Job feared his children might be chargeable with, in the days of their feasting; when he offered burnt-offerings according to the number of them †. For *Job said, It may be that my sons have sinned, and cursed God in their hearts. He does not imagine that they had openly blasphemed God. But he fears that their festivity might have proved a temptation to them to think lightly of God, to forget their obligations to him, and thus in effect to curse him in their hearts. For he well knew, that through the corruption of human nature, feasting and cursing, prosperity and irreligion, often go hand in hand.

* Hof. ii. 8.

MANY are the spiritual mercies, which the unregenerate receive from God. He gives them his word and ordinances, wherein the bread of life is exhibited. He warns them by his servants. He strives with them by his Spirit. They reject and despise the heavenly manna. Their souls lothe this light food.

O!

* Isa. i. 2, 3.

† Job i. 5.

O! what infinite patience doth he exercise toward them! What a wonder of long-suffering is it, that he doth not consume them in a moment; that he so often turns away his anger, and stirs not up against them all his wrath; that he suffers his earth to bear them, even while it groans under the load of their wickedness; that he doth not *command the deep to swallow them up, and the pit to shut her mouth upon them. But herein he discovers that he is God and not man, that he is justly entitled to the appellation of the Highest, because he is kind unto the unthankful, and the evil †.

INGRATITUDE is a sin eminently chargeable even against the children of God. It is far less surprising that this should be the character of those who acknowledge such a father as Satan, who, instead of eternally glorifying God for the honour of being made an angel of light, by his ingratitude and ambition transformed himself into an angel of darkness; than that they, who are children of the Father of mercies, and themselves the children of so many mercies, should so often requite him like a foolish people, and unwise. When they are anxious for any mercy, they resolve, and perhaps solemnly vow, that if God will be pleased to bestow it, they will ever retain a grateful sense of his kindness. He condescends to grant their request. But often they remember not the multitude of his mercies, but provoke him, like his ancient people, at the sea, even at the Red Sea ‡. This was the great aggravation of the sin of the Israelites, that it was committed even at the Red Sea. These words refer to the signal evidence of their unbelief, not after they had passed through the sea, but before they had entered it. For when Pharaoh drew nigh—the children of Israel cried unto the Lord. And they said unto Moses, Because there were no graves in Egypt, hast thou taken us away to die in the wilderness §. But a day or two before, the Lord had delivered them from their bondage, by a multitude of miracles.

* Psal. lxxix. 15. † Luke vi. 35. ‡ Psal. cvi. 7.

§ Exod. xiv. 10,—12.

miracles. Yet, instead of remembering his mercies for a long time after, they immediately provoked him by their unbelief. Thus, his people, even when asking renewed deliverances, often forget those that they have formerly, and perhaps recently received. We have a striking example of the natural ingratitude of the heart towards God, in the history of the ten lepers whom Christ cleansed. He improves their conduct for the instruction of those that were present, by proposing a question; and alas! is there not too much reason to propose the same to the bulk of Christians? *Were there not ten cleansed; but where are the nine? Such conduct displays the great treachery of the heart, both with respect to God and ourselves. The heart deceives itself. When we earnestly desire any mercy, we flatter ourselves that we will receive and improve it with thanksgiving. The heart also deals deceitfully with God; for it forgets him, as soon as the mercy is received. Therefore, he proclaims ingratitude to be an evidence of the basest treachery: I said, How shall I put thee among the children, and give thee the pleasant land, the goodly heritage of the hosts, or multitude of nations? And I said, Thou shalt call me, My Father, and shalt not turn away from me. Then it follows: Surely, as a wife treacherously departeth from her husband, so have ye dealt treacherously with me, O house of Israel †. This conduct towards our gracious Benefactor is productive of bitter consequences. Our ingratitude for mercies received often provokes him to deny us others, which he would otherwise bestow, sometimes to recal those already given, and frequently to blast them in the enjoyment. Therefore, saith the Lord to his unthankful people, I will return, and take away my corn in the time thereof, and my wine in the season thereof ‡. And again; But this people hath a revolting, and a rebellious heart, they are revolted and gone. Neither say they in their heart, Let us now fear the Lord our God, who giveth rain, both the former and the latter in his season: he reserveth unto us the appointed pointed weeks of the harvest. Your iniquities have turned away these things, and your sins have withholden good things from you.*

* Luke xvii. 17.

† Jer. iii. 19, 20.

‡ Hos. ii. 9.

2. BY disposing us to make a God of our mercies. The deceitfulness of the heart, so violent is its opposition to the living God, works by contraries, and often by extremes. If it do not tempt us to despise his mercies altogether, it will excite us to put them out of their proper place. By either of these methods, although directly opposite, it gains its wicked purpose, in making us forget the God of our mercy. Often do Christians give that room in their hearts to the gift, whether spiritual or temporal, which they ought to reserve for the great Giver. The mercy itself is more the object of their desire and delight, than the sanctified use of it. The perfidious heart easily makes the transition from a supposed thankfulness to the Benefactor, to an overvalue for the benefit. We are apt to suffer this adoration of Divine mercies to steal in upon us, by falsely viewing it as an evidence of our gratitude †. We perceive that
the

* Jer. v. 23,—25.

† THAT idolatry, which seems to have a just, though inglorious claim to the highest antiquity, originated in all probability from an abuse of Divine mercies, proceeding from a false notion of gratitude. Men, whose wandering life required attention to the ordinances of heaven, at the same time affording abundance of time for it, and whose unclouded sky invited them to this agreeable employment; impressed with a sense of the unspeakable utility of the heavenly bodies, and especially of the sun, might at first flatter themselves that they only testified their gratitude to God, when they darted a look of veneration to this glorious creature. Hence the transition was extremely easy to some external token of respect, such as that which Job speaks of; If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness, and my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand. Chap. xxxi. 26.—28. Yet after all, they might not think with him, that if they had done so, they had denied the God that is above. By habituating themselves to this practice, which seems to have been one of the earliest modes of adoration, and from which, indeed, the very word is borrowed, they would soon avowedly worship the creature more than the Creator, address the sun as itself the proper object of worship, and even transfer their worship to fire as its most natural emblem.

the one extreme of undervaluing the tokens of God's love, is highly dishonouring to him; and, from an anxiety to avoid it, rush into the other, and immoderately set our hearts upon them. Endeavouring to avoid one evil, we plunge into another, equally dangerous to ourselves and offensive to God. For he is so provoked by his own people, that he often takes away the mercy altogether, or turns it into a cross; so that its continuance gives them more pain than ever the prospect, or the enjoyment of it gave them pleasure. Though he withdraw not the mercy, he frequently changes its nature. He will suffer no rival in thy heart, O Christian, for it all belongs to him; and when thy love to worldly comforts ceases to be secondary and subordinate, it is an encroachment on his prerogative. Therefore, must the usurper of the throne of God be cast down, that in all things he may have the pre-eminence. When precious comforts are thus converted into severe crosses, how great is the trial! There is a double bitterness attending it; not only that of the distress presently felt, but the painful recollection of the happiness formerly enjoyed. The history of Rachel, the beloved wife of Jacob, affords us an instance of the danger of an overweening attachment to any temporal blessing, whether desired or received. So anxious was she for children, that she said to her husband; Give me children, else I die; as if he had been to her, in God's stead, who had withheld from her the fruit of the womb. But the greatness of her sin was declared by the severity of her suffering. For that very event which she so ardently desired as her chief mercy, and on which she so unlawfully set her heart, proved, in the righteous dispensation of God, the occasion of her bitter affliction and untimely death. She fell a sacrifice to that temporal mercy which she idolised*. Agreeably to her experience, the comfort, which the Christian immoderately values, often becomes his Benoni, the son of his sorrow, and the cause of his suffering.

W.D.

* Gen. xxx. 1, xxxv. 16.—18.

WE have given an example of a mercy sinfully desired; and we may add another with respect to one received, but abused. Eli was a saint of God; but his great sin seems to have been an inordinate love to his children, which carried him so far, that rather than be severe to them, he would openly neglect his duty to God. Although his sons were men of Belial, yet he only rebuked them gently for their enormous wickedness, saying; *Why do ye such things? But the Lord who had anointed him to the priesthood, smote him in this very mercy, that was the occasion of unfaithfulness in his service. He said to him, Wherefore kick ye at my sacrifice, and at mine offering, which I have commanded in my habitation, and honourest thy sons above me, to make yourselves fat with the chiefest of all the offerings of Israel my people?—Behold! the days come, that I will cut off thine arm, and the arm of thy father's house, that there shall not be an old man in thine house.—And this shall be a sign unto thee, that shall come upon thy two sons, upon Hophni and Phinehas: in one day they shall die both of them†. In the word, God often reveals himself under the character of a jealous God. He is very jealous of his honour, and will discover it by the severe chastisement of his own children, when they turn their hearts away from him, and fix them on any thing else. Therefore, he saith; Behold I have refined thee, but not with silver; I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction. For mine own sake, even for mine own sake will I do it. For how should my name be polluted? and I will not give my glory unto another ‡.

3. BY consuming Divine mercies on lust. The wicked ask, that they may consume it on their lusts §. They neither desire mercies, nor improve those which are bestowed, for the glory of God; but only as making provision for their inordinate or unlawful affections. This iniquity God charges against the Israelites. That corn and wine, and oil, and silver, and gold, which he gave

* 1 Sam. ii. 12. 23.

† Ver. 31. 34.

‡ Isa. xlviii. 10, 11.

§ Jam. iv. 3.

gave them, they prepared for Baal*. The blessings, which he hath bountifully bestowed, are often devoted to the pride of our own hearts. We find ourselves in possession of these, and we forget the God who gave them. Like Jeshurun when we have waxed fat with mercies, we are ready to kick, to forsake God that made us, and lightly to esteem the Rock of our Salvation. Of the Rock that begat us we are unmindful, and we forget God that formed us †. This iniquity is especially dishonouring to God, when chargeable against those, who in profession are his children: as Moses adds in that song, of which the preceding words are a part; When the Lord saw it, he abhorred them, because of the provoking of his sons, and of his daughters. This conduct he ascribes to their unfaithfulness and deceit. For they are a very forward generation, children in whom is no faith; that is, in whom is no truth, persons who cannot be depended on, who are full of perfidy. The same thing is asserted in the words of our text; The pride of thine heart hath deceived thee. By reason of outward prosperity, the deceitfulness of the heart wrought by the lust of pride. How often is it seen, that those who showed a great regard for the duties of religion, when in mean or narrow circumstances as to the world, seem to think them unworthy of their attention when they attain to greatness or affluence. The ax boasts itself against him that heweth therewith; the saw magnifies itself against him that shaketh it; the rod shakes itself against him that lifteth it up; and the staff lifts up itself, as if it were no wood ‡. When men discover such ingratitude towards the God of their mercies, and make him the butt of their pride, it is no wise surprising that they should extend it towards their fellow-men. Their strength is firm. They are not in trouble as other men: neither are they plagued like other men. Therefore pride compasseth them about as a chain: violence covereth them as a garment §. We are in danger of consuming the mercies of God on our carnal appetite, like the Israelites in another instance: They did eat, and were filled;—they were not estranged from their lust. When men continue to consume his benefits in this manner, he is sometimes provoked to consume them in his anger: Therefore their days he did consume in vanity, and their years in trouble *.

* Hof. ii. 8. † Deut. xxxii. 15. 18. ‡ Isa. x. 15. § Ps. lxxiii. 4.—6.

4. By ascribing their prosperity to some other cause than God. His ancient people took that corn, and wine, and oil, which he had given them, and not only prepared them for Baal, but ascribed them to him. So far were they from improving them to his glory, that they did not even acknowledge him as the Giver. It is the language of the finner; I will go after my lovers, that give me my bread and my water, my wool and my flax, mine oil and my drink †. When the Lord smiles on the work of his hands, and gives him abundance of the good things of this life, he ascribes all to his own industry. He says in his heart, My power and the might of my hand have gotten me all this wealth ‡. Perhaps he attributes the blessings received to his very lusts, to the success of his covetousness, or of his ambition. Thus did the vain-glorious Sennacherib. He was only the rod of God's anger, and the staff in his hand was God's indignation; yet we find him uttering this presumptuous language: By the strength of my hand I have done it, and by my wisdom; for I am prudent: and I have removed the bounds of the people, and have robbed their treasures, and I have put down the inhabitants like a valiant man §. Even the Lord's people, from the prevalence of deceit, are in great danger of ascribing their mercies to some other cause than God, or to something besides him. They will not wholly deny the praise to the God of their Salvation; but they do not ascribe it entirely to him. When they receive signal mercies from him, they are apt to imagine that these are in some degree deserved by their holiness and integrity of conversation; that

he

* Pl. lxxviii. 29.—33.

† Hof. ii. 5.

‡ Deut. viii. 17.

§ Isa. x. 5. 13. 15.

he could not justly deny them such tokens of his favour, when they are so faithful and diligent in his service. He often, indeed, confers their mercies in such a manner, as to exclude every appearance of any hand but his own; as altogether to cast out boasting: but legality shuts its eye against all these evidences, and claims a share of the praise with God. His language to a professing people, applies, alas! too frequently to his own children: I have even from the beginning declared it unto thee; before it came to pass I shewed it thee; lest thou shouldest say, Mine idol hath done them, and my graven image and my molten image hath commanded them.—Yea, thou heardest not, yea, thou knewest not, yea, from that time that thine ear was not opened: for I knew that thou wouldest deal very treacherously, and wast called a transgressor from the womb *.

5. By denying God the use of those mercies which he hath himself bestowed. When, in the course of his providence, he confers on one a greater portion of common blessings than on another; it is for this end, that he may use them for his glory, and in the manner of laying them out, return them to the Lord. No talent is to be laid up in a napkin. According to the measure of temporal benefits received from God, we are stewards for him. He allows us to take the lawful use of them; but forbids us to confine them to ourselves. It is still his command, with respect to all the mercies he confers; Occupy till I come;—Cast thy bread upon the waters. The good things of this life, which flow from his liberal hand, must be devoted to God himself. Therefore, it is promised; I will consecrate their gain to the Lord, and their substance unto the Lord of the whole earth †. But why to the Lord of the whole earth? This very character would seem to set aside the force of the declaration. Although he were hungry he would not tell us, for the world is his, and the fulness thereof. Yet those things which we possess, however unworthy in themselves, from the state of the Church, and from the ordinary course of Providence, have such an importance conferred on them, that in infinite condescension the Lord declares, that he hath need of them. Not absolutely, for the reason already mentioned; but relatively, and according to circumstances; because it is his pleasure that the necessities of his Church should be supplied in this manner. To limit and regulate us in our expectations, the omnipotent God, in the general tenor of his conduct, deigns to make use of the intervention of means. To those who are rich in this world he gives the same commission as to the clouds, to distil their abundance more equally on those who are below them. He could easily at once disperse his treasures without their assistance. But it secures a greater return of gratitude, when in this way the bowels of the saints are refreshed, and when they are retained in constant dependence on him for their daily supplies.
and

* Isa. xlviii. 5. 8.

† Mic. iv. 13.

WE are also to remember, that while in the good Providence of God we are blessed with fulness, many of our brethren of mankind are in danger of perishing for want. According to our ability we ought to supply them: and this, if done in faith, the Lord considers as done to himself. He that giveth to the poor, lendeth to the Lord. The poor of his people especially call for our love and sympathy. How earnest was the great Apostle of the Gentiles, in stirring up the Church to make liberal contributions for the poor saints at Jerusalem! By what a powerful argument does Christ enforce this duty! Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these my disciples, ye have done it unto me. To this purpose is his injunction; *Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, that when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations. He calls his hearers to lay out the riches of this world in acts of beneficence to the poor, and especially his poor; as in this manner the saints, who have been refreshed by them in their state of pilgrimage, will joyfully welcome them, them, as their generous benefactors, into the mansions above. Not as if this liberality were meritorious of everlasting habitations: but when it proceeds from a sincere and believing heart, it is a certain evidence of a right to enter in through the gates into the city. He calls the good things of this life the mammon of unrighteousness, not only because they are often unjustly acquired, but because they are laid out in the same manner, if we consider not God's end in giving them. But many deny those things to God, which his own bounty hath bestowed. Though they have all things and abound, they would esteem it prodigality to contribute any thing for the Church of Christ, or for the poor of his people. But this is the way to provoke him to curse their blessings, or to remove them altogether. *There is that scattereth and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty. David was convinced that his own liberality, and that of his subjects, in contributing for building the temple, was only restoring to God a small portion of what they had received from him. O Lord our God, all this store, that we have prepared to build thee an house for thy holy name, cometh of thine own hand, and is all thy own †.

* Luke xvi. 9.

6. By unsatisfied desires and immoderate longings for a greater degree of temporal prosperity. When the heart hath tasted of mercies of this nature, it is not satisfied; it craves more. If its desires be fulfilled, instead of being content with these, it flatters itself, that if such another mercy were bestowed, it would ask nothing further. But this only argues its deceit; for even though this be granted, it is still as importunate as ever. The more it receives, its desires are enlivened and enlarged the more. The pleasures, the honours, and the riches of this world, which are all that it contains, are totally unsatisfying. The soul feels a want and emptiness attending all sublunary pleasures, which renewed enjoyment can never supply. The Israelites first murmured
for

* Prov. xi. 24.

† 1 Chron. xxix. 16.

for water. When they found this, they could not drink of it, because it was bitter. When the bitter water was miraculously sweetened, they complained that they had no bread. When manna was rained from heaven about their tents, they lusted for flesh, and ardently longed to return to the pots of Egypt. So unsatisfying is worldly honour, that as we learn from profane history, that Macedonian prince, who had no better right to be distinguished from others by the flattering surname of the Great, than his bearing a greater resemblance to the Destroyer, when he had over-run almost all the kingdoms of the earth, like a torrent, sat down and wept, because he had not another world to conquer. In regard to riches, we have the estimate of Solomon. Describing the avaricious man, he says; There is no end of all his labour, neither is his eye satisfied with riches; neither saith he, For whom do I labour, and bereave my soul of good? He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver, nor he that loveth abundance with increase†.*

7. BY hardening itself under prosperity. No mercy whatsoever can leave us as it finds us. It must either prove a blessing or a curse. It will either have a mollifying, or a hardening influence on our hearts. The goodness of God, manifested in prosperous dispensations, will either be a mean of leading us to repentance; or by despising the riches thereof, after our hardness and impenitent heart, we will treasure up to ourselves wrath against the day of wrath‡. The former, indeed, is the natural and direct tendency of all the mercies which we receive from our liberal Benefactor: but accidentally, through the depravity of human nature, the latter is alas! by far the most ordinary consequence. Those mercies that the wicked receive from God are attended by his curse, which deprives them of the very nature of mercies: and instead of being improved as means of repentance, they prove to them occasions of hardening. Because Providence smiles on them, they either deny a Providence

* Eccles. iv. 8.

† Eccles. v. 10.

‡ Rom. ii. 4, 5.

vidence altogether, or persuade themselves that God is by no means displeas'd with their iniquities. Because judgment is not executed against their evil works speedily, their hearts are fully set in them to do evil. Even this may be in part verified as to the children of God, when in a state of declension. They cannot, indeed, by the abuse of mercies, treasure up to themselves vindictive wrath; but they often subject themselves to fatherly anger. Often, as a severe chastisement for their sins, he suffers them to be greatly hardened under mercies.—Those of a temporal nature prove occasions of partial obduracy. The mercies and deliverances, which the Lord granted to that godly king Jehoshaphat, seem to have hardened his heart in some measure: for he joined himself with Ahaziah king of Israel, who did very wickedly. Therefore God sent a prophet to inform him, that he had broken his works *. Spiritual mercies are also sometimes abused as an occasion of obduracy. Their gospel-privileges and enjoyments, nay, their highest spiritual attainments may be prostituted by the corruption within them, for turning away their hearts from God. Peter had not only received many distinguishing evidences of his Master's approbation in the commendation of his faith, but had recently been admitted to participate of the symbols of his body and blood; and had his feet washed by his condescending Lord: yet these very pledges of love the deceitfulness of his heart abused, as an occasion of awakening pride and self-confidence. Therefore, he insisted, that though all the disciples, and even all men should deny Christ, yet he would not deny him; nay, that though he should die with him, he would not deny him.

THEREFORE, ye careless ones, ye who are at ease in Zion, consider that you do not, you cannot receive God's mercies in vain. To you they must either prove a real blessing or a dreadful curse.—While you continue estranged from Christ, all your blessings blessings are curses to you. They are so in the mean time. For you receive no mercy from God as a Father. To this you have forfeited all your title by sin. All the temporal kindneses bestowed proceed from him as a judge, who sustains the condemned criminal till the sentence be either executed or relaxed. They come not to you under the banner of the Covenant of Grace, but under the maledictory sentence of the Covenant of Works. You are curfed in your basket, and in your store; in your lying down, and in your rising up. They also prove curses to you eventually. Instead of tracing up the streams of creature-comforts to the only fountain of true and lasting blessedness; you convert them into the bitter water that causeth the curse, by suffering yourselves to be hurried away by them towards the lake that burneth for ever and ever. For you abuse them as the instruments of fulfilling your wicked desires, as occasions of turning you farther away from God. So dreadfully do you pervert common mercies from their original design, that the whole creation is represented as groaning and travailing in pain under the load of your iniquity. That curse, which springs out of the blessing, by the abuse of it, is of all the most bitter; as by this conduct you offer the highest insult to him, who supplieth the wants of every thing that liveth. Be assured, that all these mercies shall rise up in judgment against you, and, if you continue in this miserable state, greatly aggravate your condemnation. Embrace God, therefore, while he waiteth to be gracious. Embrace him as the God of your mercy through his beloved Son, as he offers himself to you in the gospel. Then all your mercies will be sanctified, and come to you as tokens of his parental love, and preludes of the eternal fruits of it.

* 2 Chron. xx. 36, 37.

As for you, my brethren, who have chosen God to be your portion; it is your incumbent duty to retain his mercies fresh in your memories, to have them engraved on your hearts. There is no merit in in your gratitude. It cannot entitle you to future mercies. But this is the path of duty, in which, by the most indispensable obligations, you are bound to walk. Give him all the glory of what mercies soever you receive: saying, Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me, be stirred up to bless his holy name. Put them not in the place of God to you, else you will provoke him to jealousy. Depending on his grace, let it be your constant aim to improve your time, your health, your riches, your abilities, your gospel-privileges, your all for his glory. Blessed is that servant, whom, when his master cometh, he shall find so doing. He will say unto him, Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord. Let your desires be regulated according to God's word, with respect to temporal enjoyments. You have no title to ask more than what Christ hath pointed out in that form of prayer which he taught his disciples: Give us this day our daily bread.—Labour, especially for that meat which perisheth not, for the daily bread of your souls. Let it be your continual desire to feed by faith on the bread of life. Here it is warrantable for you to have enlarged and unsatisfied desires; and the boundless capacity of the soul in this respect was given it for no other purpose. It was framed with this faculty of unlimited craving, just that it might be filled with an infinite God. Nor will he frustrate such desires. For he filleth the hungry with good things. The liberal soul deviseth liberally, and by liberal things shall be stand. Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness; for they shall be filled.

S E R M O N XXII.

ON THE DECEITFULNESS OF THE HEART, WITH RESPECT TO ADVERSITY.

ISAIAH lvii. 17.

—I smote him: I hid me and was wroth; and he went on frowardly in the way of his own heart.

IN this verse we have an account of God's displeasure with Israel. To denote the greatness of it, the same expression is twice used;—I was wroth. The cause is also assigned, which was the iniquity of his covetousness. With this sin God's ancient people were eminently chargeable. We have one instance mentioned in the context. With respect to the watchmen of Israel, it is said, chap. lvi. 11. They are greedy dogs which can never have enough. The effect of Divine indignation is likewise declared; I smote him; I hid me. While these words express the manner in which God deals with his own children, by withdrawing his gracious presence from them; as respecting his professing people in general, they seem literally to refer to some severe temporal calamity. He smote them by hiding his face. He withdrew his protection from them, and they became a prey to their enemies. But what was the consequence?

Did

Did Israel return to the Lord? Far from it. Afflictions, of themselves, will never produce this effect. He went on frowardly in the way of his own heart. He persisted obstinately, perversely, or rebelliously. Literally, he went on like a vagabond, in courses of error and self-deceit; the very curse of Cain. He continued under an evil counsellor, and in a wicked way;—after the way of his own heart.

HAVING formerly illustrated the deceitfulness of the heart in the abuse of prosperity, all that we propose from these words is, to consider it with respect to adversity.

1. THIS sometimes appears by despising afflictions. Many attempt to outbrave calamity, as if they were stronger than God. Therefore saith the Apostle; *Ye have forgotten the exhortation which speaketh unto you as unto children, My son, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord. Those may be said to despise his chastening, who account it a small matter, who from a principle of pride and presumption think it unworthy of them to seem affected with it, or refuse to turn to the hand that smiteth. Many, when they feel affliction taking hold of their spirits, as well as of their bodies, and awakening them to a concern about their state, deem it entirely inconsistent with the dignity of their characters to suffer this to appear, or even to indulge it within themselves; and are affronted at the idea of being in any degree afraid to make their appearance before the awful and impartial tribunal. We despise affliction, when we ascribe it merely to natural causes. In bodily distress, or any outward adversity, whether affecting our persons, our characters, or our substance, we may generally allow the concurrence of these. But if our views extend no farther, we undoubtedly despise the chastening of the Lord. For whatever may be the instrumentality of natural causes, we may be assured that there is a superior, a divine agency.—Though God may employ these as the immediate means of affliction; yet these very means are under his

* Heb. xii. 5. Prov. iii. 11.

his direction, and only accomplish his purposes. In all the adversities that befall us, he hath still a supreme and over-ruling hand. *Affliction cometh not forth of the dust, neither doth trouble spring out of the ground. These figurative expressions are used to represent, in a striking manner, the absurdity of viewing affliction as if it proceeded solely from natural causes, as if it grew up like an herb of the field, a spontaneous production of nature, without any care of the husbandman. Elsewhere the Spirit of God exhibits the same conduct, in viewing adversity as if it were entirely accidental, in a ridiculous point of light, by comparing it with other things, which either to do, or to imagine, would argue the greatest folly. Will a lion roar in the forest, when he hath no prey? Will a young lion cry out of his den, if he hath taken nothing? Can a bird fall in a snare upon the earth, where no gin is for him? Shall one take up a snare from the earth, and have taken nothing at all? Shall a trumpet be blown in the city, and the people not be afraid? Shall there be evil in a city, and the Lord hath not done it †? The evil of affliction or punishment is here meant: and these questions proposed by God himself, declare, not only that where this natural evil is, it always proceeds from him; but also, that those despise it who perceive not, or consider not the operation of his hand. He either evidently employs means in laying on affliction, or sends it without any obvious intervention of means, or directly counteracts them altogether. We may give you an undeniable illustration of this, which will be confirmed by the observation of almost every thinking person. Have you not often seen that those, who, especially when afraid of an infectious disorder, have taken every possible precaution to avoid it, and have gone so far as to throw off natural affection, by leaving their nearest and dearest relations while in affliction, have eventually found that all their labour and anxiety were in vain? While flying from their indispensable

* Job v. 6.

† Amos iii. 4,—6.

indispensable duty to others, they have themselves been arrested by affliction: whereas those, on the other hand, who in obedience to the call of Providence, have put their lives in God's hand, endeavoured to discharge their duty, and discovered no undue anxiety, have been preserved in a surprising manner from any injury whatever. Is not this an evidence, that whatever be the instrumentality of natural means, it is all derived from the over-ruling hand of God; and that they are so far from being absolutely necessary as the immediate occasions of affliction, that he can at pleasure directly counteract their operation?

AGAIN, we despise affliction, if we consider not its origin, which is the corruption of our whole nature by sin. Hence it is that all adversity primarily springs: for without sin there could be no suffering. The words formerly mentioned may in their connection be considered as an illustration of this: *Although affliction cometh not forth of the dust, neither doth trouble spring out of the ground; yet man is born unto trouble, as the sparks fly upwards: that is, “ Though “ man himself be indeed a creature of the dust, “ formed out of the ground, and possessed of a mortal body; yet we are not to apprehend that his “ origin as a creature is the cause of his suffering, “ that affliction hath come forth of the dust with himself, or that the troubles to which he is exposed,
 “ arise, as some heretics maintain, from the natural “ weakness of his frame, because his body is composed of gross matter; but to view these as occasioned by that corruption diffused through his nature, by disobedience to God and breach of covenant with him. Man is indeed born unto trouble; but this proceeds not from any necessary or inherent infirmity in his original constitution, but from his being born a sinner.” For without sin, the body of man, though material, and so corruptible, would have been preserved by the hand of Omnipotence

* Job v. 6, 7.

tence from affliction and death, from every symptom of actual corruption. This interpretation is confirmed by a review of the context, and by connecting this passage with what is declared in the close of the preceding chapter; where men are said to dwell in houses of clay, to have their foundation also in the dust, and to be so feeble as to be crushed before the moth *. Now, the words formerly mentioned may be viewed as illustrating these. “Though his foundation be in the dust, yet it is not on account of this that he is subject to trouble; but because his foundation hath been weakened and destroyed by the entrance of sin.” It is therefore highly necessary that we should trace up affliction to its source, and humbly confess that we were shapen in iniquity and conceived in sin.

ADVERSITY is also despised, when the subjects of it do not consider the more immediate cause of it, which is the anger of God because of sin, and confess with Moses the man of God; We are consumed by thine anger, and by thy wrath are we troubled †. The Lord may, indeed, in sovereignty visit his own children with the rod, without any immediate procuring cause on their part. But it is still the safest course for us to view our iniquities as the reason of his contending; because there is always too much ground for it: and it is only of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed. It is, therefore, our duty under affliction, of what nature soever, to review our hearts and lives, to search out our sins, and particularly to make a diligent inquiry about those which may be the immediate causes of provocation.

FURTHER, affliction is despised, if we do not consider the design of it. The end which God proposes in his word, is thereby to discover to us our sins, and turn us from them to himself. If they be bound in fetters, and holden in the cords of affliction; then he sheweth them their work, and their transgressions that they have exceeded. He openeth also their ear to discipline, and commandeth

* Job iv. 19.

† Psal. xc. 7.

mandeth that they return from iniquity*. In a word, the chastening of the Lord is despised, when those who are under it seek not unto him. Many are so careless and obdurate under affliction, that they will not even apply to him for deliverance: and this contempt of the rod, especially as discovered by unwillingness to call upon God, is pointed out as a fruit and evidence of the hypocrisy or deceitfulness of the heart; The hypocrites in heart heap up wrath; they cry not when God bindeth them †.

2. BY repining under adversity. In the exhortation mentioned by the Apostle, it is not merely said; My son, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord; but added; Neither faint when thou art rebuked of him; or as it is in the Old Testament, Neither be weary of his correction. Persons repine under affliction, if they spurn at it; if, like Ephraim, they are as a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke; if they kick and throw at providential dispensations, like an untamed bullock that has not been used to labour.—A fretful spirit is discovered, when we are apt to account God unjust in afflicting us. Often men make no other improvement of a discovery of affliction as proceeding from God, than to accuse him of severity; as if the Judge of the whole earth would not do right. They are ready to say, like the wicked Cain; My punishment is greater than I can bear. They compare their sins and sufferings together, and instead of acknowledging that after all that is come upon them, for their evil deeds and for their great trespass, God hath punished them less than their iniquities deserve ‡; they see their sins in so diminishing a light, that they are in danger of apprehending that their punishment exceeds their desert. Indeed, we may be assured that we are never delivered from a fretful disposition under adverse dispensations, unless we are not only preserved from reckoning God unjust, but enabled positively to justify him in the whole of his conduct towards us; unless we cordially join with Daniel in his confession; O Lord, righteousness belongeth unto

unto

* Job xxxvi. 8.—10.

† Job xxxvi. 13.

‡ Ezra ix. 13.

unto thee, but unto us confusion of faces, as at this day*. Till we cheerfully exculpate God, and charge all the blame to our own iniquity, we are never properly delivered from repining. You may not absolutely proceed so far in presumption, as in words to accuse God; but it is undeniable that you still do so in heart, till you be brought expressly to justify the whole of his conduct, and to say in sincerity of soul; He is the rock, his work is perfect; for all his ways are judgment; a God of truth, and without iniquity; just and right is he †. The Lord is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works ‡.—Under adversity we also faint and repine, unless we exercise faith with respect to God's wise and holy ends, and as to a blessed termination of it. If we yield to dejection and unbelief, it is a certain evidence that we are fretful under his chastening hand.—The case is the same, if we be not brought to resignation, and made to say; Good is the will of the Lord. If we do not commit ourselves into his hand, and resign ourselves wholly to his disposal, we assuredly fret at his dispensations.—The same thing may be observed with respect to patience. This differs from resignation; as the latter denotes a present submission of ourselves to the divine will, and the former, a waiting God's time. Resignation respects our present exercise under the rod; patience—our expectation of deliverance from it in such a season and manner as shall be for the glory of God. Now, a fretful spirit under adversity is a sad discovery of inward deceitfulness; for it shows, that our hearts would lead us to renounce God and refuse subjection to him. Can any thing be a greater evidence of deceit, than for vain man to imagine that he hath a right boldly to inquire of God the reasons of his conduct? Shall the clay say to him that fashioneth it, What makest thou? or thy work, He hath no hands?

3. BY keeping death at a distance, if the affliction be of a bodily kind. The corrupt heart still presents the same deceit to us, wherewith Satan at first entangled tangled our first parents: Ye shall not surely die. And this is a suggestion to which we are extremely willing to listen. Though death is the end of all afflictions, though every affliction, nay, every infirmity, every pang, however transient, is a prelude of our approaching exit, and a warning to prepare for it; yet men are still disposed to flatter themselves with hopes of life, how little ground soever there be for such expectations from the nature or course of the disease. You will often see a man in the very grasp of the king of terrors, when physicians and friends have renounced all hope, still deluding himself with the pleasing expectation of overcoming the power of his malady. Can this be accounted for, without resolving it into the superlative deceitfulness of the heart? But on this we enlarge not, as we have spoken a little of it already, on a former branch of this subject.

* Dan. ix. 7.

† Deut. xxxii. 4.

‡ Psal. cxlv. 17.

4. By forming empty resolutions of repentance and reformation, while under affliction. Many in trouble assume an air of penitence, of whom it may be said in the days of prosperity, that God is not in all their thoughts. When the valley of the shadow of death begins to open, in its unspeakable terrors, on the sinner's view, when he hath the prospect of making an immediate appearance before the Judge of the universe, while at the same time his sins stare him in the face, and he is made to possess the iniquities of his youth; he promises to himself, to God, and to others, that if his life be mercifully spared, he will become quite a new man, renounce the wicked courses to which he hath been addicted, and set his heart on the ways of God. But the removal of the rod so frequently demonstrates the vanity of these resolutions, that death-bed repentance is become a proverbial phrase, for expressing any thing on which there can be very little dependence. No sooner are many such penitents restored to health and strength, than they forget all the resolutions, vows and engagements made in the time of affliction ; nay, perhaps blush at the recollection of them, and are affronted that their acquaintance should know such instances of their weakness: and to remove from their minds, as far as possible, every injurious idea of their being serious in these, they will afford them the most certain evidence of the contrary, by plunging deeper than ever into the mire of iniquity. If these resolutions at any time hang heavy on their minds, they strive to lighten the burden by using every mean to harden conscience, obliterate the memory of the past, and debar any apprehensions of the future. In a word, they do all in their power to fly from themselves. As for the ministers or christians, whose instructions, exhortations and prayers they have earnestly solicited when in affliction, after their recovery they know them not. Perhaps, the very sight of them gives an edge to conscience and memory, which they wish eternally blunted.

Now, whence is it that these resolutions, made in the time of trouble, appear so transitory and ineffectual? The reason is, that they have proceeded from a deceived, and a self-deceiving heart. They have all been made in a dependence on their own strength. The work has been by no means thorough; and therefore it has no duration. Though in some measure convinced of sin, as to its dangerous consequences; they have had no discovery of its evil nature; of its abominable impurity, as committed against a God of infinite holiness; or unspeakable wickedness, as opposed to a God of infinite love. They have never seen the necessity of being born again of the Spirit, of being really renewed in the Spirit of their mind. They have not been in an agony to enter in at the strait gate; and there is little wonder though they be afterwards nowise concerned to walk in the narrow way of evangelical holiness. Notwithstanding all their bustle about eternal life, they have been satisfied to retain the old man, with all his lusts. Therefore, he breaks out in their conversation, with all his deeds.

5. By exciting men to make lies their refuge. The deceitful heart prompts them to trust in earthly means for deliverance from affliction, in the power of medicine and human assistance. But alas! this is a false confidence; for vain is the help of man. All means must be ineffectual, unless the Lord be pleased to bless them. But many entirely depend on the means, and vainly flatter themselves with hopes, because of their efficacy in other cases. Alluding to such conduct as this, the Lord describes the folly of his ancient people in the following manner; *When Ephraim saw his sickness, and Judah saw his wound, then went Ephraim to the Assyrian, and sent to king Jareb: yet could he not heal you, nor cure you of your wound. Even that good king, Aha, provoked the Lord by his false confidence in adversity, in two different instances. With respect to the first, we are told that Hanani the seer came to him and said; Because thou hast relied on the king of Syria, and not relied on the Lord thy God, therefore is the host of the king of Syria escaped out of thine hand. And afterwards, when under bodily affliction, in his disease he sought not to the Lord, but to the physicians †. If the affliction which persons are under is not of a bodily kind, or does not immediately affect their health and strength: they often fly to their wicked companions, that they may drown their cares in drunkenness and debauchery. Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die. Or they betake themselves to diversions; like Saul, who, when the evil spirit came upon him, called upon David to play on the harp, that he might chase him away. This course many take to lull or chase away convictions, or dispel their grief for worldly losses. This evil spirit that haunts them, they try to banish by amusements.—We do not here speak of the many lying refuges of a spiritual kind, to which sinners resort under adversity, because we have considered several of these already. Only in general it may be observed, that when they find the vanity of all human applications,

* Hos. v. 13.

† 2 Chron. xvi. 7.—12.

tions, and all their earthly hopes to be as the giving up of the ghost, they will even apply to God for deliverance. Nay, through the force of education, instruction, or an awakened conscience, they may pretend to fly to Christ. But this is by no means matter of choice with them, but of dire necessity. They see, perhaps, that they have no time left for performing good works, for doing as much as in their apprehension might entitle them to eternal life. Therefore, rather than perish altogether, they prefer that way which alone seems to afford them any distant prospect of safety. They are on a bed of affliction, *tossed like a wild bull in a net, being full of the fury of the Lord, and of the rebuke of God. Therefore, from the constraining influence of terror, they will pretend to rely on Christ, though with far greater reluctance than one accustomed to fare sumptuously every day, would submit to feed on the husks of swine, merely to preserve himself from perishing. But though this be the only true refuge of the soul, it proves a false one to them; because they do not embrace it with the heart. Perhaps, they secretly despise Christ and his righteousness, and are so unwilling to be eternally indebted to sovereign grace for salvation, that nothing but the overwhelming fear of hell would make them yield for a moment to so humiliating a claim.

OTHERS, it may be, are rationally convinced of the necessity of his all-perfect righteousness, for answering the demands of law and justice; but they cannot submit to him as a complete Saviour. They would joyfully embrace him as a Priest, to save them from the wrath to come; but they cannot acknowledge him as a King, to deliver them from sin the cause of it, and from this present evil world. The Christ, whom they pretend to receive, is indeed a false refuge. He is not that deliverer come out of Sion, to turn away ungodliness. He is not that all-sufficient Redeemer, who of God is made unto us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption.—It is with regard to such false supplicants plicants that the Lord declares; They have not cried unto me with their heart, when they howled upon their beds *. Perhaps, they have cried loud enough with the voice. But in all their crying he discerns not the voice of children, but compares it to the howling of wild beasts; because the exercise of the heart is wanting. And indeed, what important difference is there between the cry of a rational, and that of a brute creature, if the rational part be not engaged. As long as he is in this situation, like Nebuchadnezzar when driven from his kingdom, his heart is changed from man's, and a beast's heart is given unto him †. But the great want in this religion of necessity, is not only perceived by the Searcher of hearts alone. It soon appears to all around. How aptly does the language of inspiration describe the suddenness of the sinner's transition from hypocritical prayers to cordial debauchery: They have not cried unto me with the heart, when they howled on their beds; they assemble themselves for corn and wine, and they rebel against me. The howlings of distress are quickly overpowered by the howlings of drunkenness. And the whole of this is ascribed to the deceitfulness of the heart; They return— in their prayers they have professed and promised to return; and they do so in their conduct;—but not to the Most High. It is only to their former wickedness. They are like a deceitful bow. However much the bow may seem bent, how fair soever the aim may appear, they still shoot wide of the pretended mark.

* Isa. li. 20.

6. By making them despise means. We have seen again and again, how the deceitfulness of the heart works by contraries, in its opposition to God. If it prevail not with those under affliction to depend absolutely on means, it will strenuously urge the total neglect of them. Many, when in trouble, reason in this manner; “If my time be come; if it be “determined that I am to die by this distress;
“then I may be certain that no means can pre“vent death: and if more time be allotted to me,

“]

* Hof. vii. 14.—16.

† Dan. iv. 16.

“ I shall recover whether I use them or not.” But this discovers the greatest folly. With equal propriety might one in health reason thus ; “ Since my days “ are determined, I can neither die before my time “ nor outlive it ; therefore, I need neither eat, nor “ drink, nor do any thing for the preservation of “ life.” But you ought to remember, that, in the decree, the means are appointed as certainly as the end ; and that the end can only be accomplished in connection with the appointed means. Therefore, they must not be separated, even in our apprehension, for a single moment. The use of means, in affliction, is often as necessary as the use of natural support, when we are in health. No means, indeed, can be of any efficacy, without the blessing of God. He often works without means, and sometimes in opposition to them. But it is still our duty to use them, humbly depending on his gracious influence. This is implied in the sixth precept of the moral law ; Thou shalt not kill. For it virtually requires of us the use of all lawful means for the preservation of life ; and prohibits the neglect of them, under the pain of being accounted by God chargeable with self-murder. When Hezekiah was in a dangerous disease, though the Lord had assured him of recovery, yet afterwards he commanded the use of certain means, in subserviency to the determined end. For Isaiah said, and undoubtedly it was by God’s command ; Let them take a lump of figs, and lay it for a plaister upon the boil ; and he shall recover *. Though Paul had himself been assured by a Divine revelation, and had communicated this assurance to all who were in the ship, that not one of them should be lost ; yet when the mariners were about to take to the boat, he said to the centurion and soldiers ; Except these abide in the ship, ye cannot be saved †. Many, when they meet with worldly losses, are apt to be so overwhelmed, as to sit down listless and inactive, as if they were to use no means for obtaining redress. They are disposed

* Isa. xxxviii. 21.

† Acts xxvii. 22. 31.

posed to say; Behold! this evil is of the Lord: why should I wait for the Lord any longer?—Or, if they be in affliction about the state of their souls, under terrors of conscience, Satan and their own deceitfulness prompt them to despise the means which God hath appointed. “We have often used them,” may they say, “and are none the better: and why should we give ourselves any more trouble about them?” But, surely, there is no situation in which we can be, but it is still the safest course to wait on the Lord. We ought to wait on him, even in the way of his judgments.

7. By seeking deliverance from the affliction itself, rather than the sanctified use of it. This is a natural fruit of deceitfulness. For it wishes always to divert our eye from God’s declared design in affliction, which is, to take away sin. We often find those who are strangers to prayer, crying to God in distress; but it is only for deliverance from this as an evil, without any sense of the necessity of deliverance from the evil of sin, or of the sanctification of the rod. In their affliction, saith the Lord, *they will seek me early. But this exercise arises only from the severity of distress, or from the force of conviction. We have many instances of it in the history of the Israelites; When he slew them, then they sought him, and they returned and enquired early after God.—Nevertheless, they did flatter him with their mouth, and they lied unto him with their tongues: For their heart was not right with him, neither were they stedfast in his covenant †. Never, till the heart be affected by the gracious influence of the Spirit, will it sincerely pour forth that prayer; Turn thou me, and I shall be turned; for thou art the Lord my God ‡. The children of God themselves are too often, indeed, more concerned about deliverance from the rod, than about a blessing with it. The severity of the stroke, or rather the impatience of their hearts, makes them neglect the consideration of the Lord’s love in afflicting them. Though he hath declared, that whom he loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son that he receiveth; and that if we be without chastisement, then are we bastards and not sons; yet the perfidious heart often dares to give God the lie, and insinuates that severe affliction is a far more likely evidence of bastardy than of sonship. Thus, the gracious end which God hath always in view in afflicting them, that they may be made meet to be partakers of his inheritance, is often obscured, if not wholly cast out of sight.

that

* Hof. v. 15. † Ps. lxxviii. 34.—37. ‡ Jer. xxxi. 19.

IN the last place, the heart discovers its deceitfulness, by abusing adversity, as an occasion of hardening itself against God. Every afflictive dispensation, in itself considered, contains the language of mercy, even to sinners. For it is the Lord's voice, calling them to repentance; and seconding his commands, invitations, entreaties and expostulations, to this purpose, in the Word. The greatest sinner, under affliction, is welcome to claim the benefit of God's gracious promise; By this shall the iniquity of Jacob be purged, and this is all the fruit to take away his sin. But by reason of the lusts of men, this merciful tendency of the rod is often counteracted. God, in sovereignty, is pleased to withhold his renewing grace, without which no means whatever will be profitable to salvation. The consequence is, that they continue in sin. Perhaps, he even withholds restraining grace: and they being left to their own counsels, abuse affliction as an occasion of hardening. This was the case with Pharaoh. The more that God afflicted him, the more was his heart hardened. When he saw that there was respite, he hardened his heart, and hearkened not unto Moses and Aaron *. Similar to this, was the conduct of that very people whom God had delivered, at the expence of Pharaoh and all his host, according to the confession of Nehemiah: Thou lesteft them in the hand of their enemies, so that they had the dominion over them; and testifiedst against them, that thou mightest bring them again unto thy law; yet they dealt proudly, and hearkened

* Exod. viii. 15.—19.

hearkened not unto thy commandments, but sinned against thy judgments ;—and withdrew the shoulder, and hardened their neck, and would not hear.*

ADVERSITY, at times, hath in some measure this effect, even as to the children of God. When he visits them with judicial strokes, because of their iniquities, instead of being humbled under them, they are sometimes rather hardened. Or, if they seem affected in the mean time, as soon as the affliction is removed, they return to sin. Thus, in the words of our text, we have an account of Ephraim's conduct, under God's smiting hand ; He went on frowardly, in the way of his own heart. These words may not only express the conduct of a backsliding people in general, but that even of real saints among them, when affliction is not attended with the Spirit's gracious influence. That they may be thus far extended, would seem from the gracious promise that follows ; I have seen his ways, and will heal him : I will lead him also, and restore comforts unto him, and to his mourners †. We have a particular example of this in the conduct of good Asa. When reproved by Hanani the Prophet, for not relying on the Lord, and informed of his displeasure with him on this account, and of the evidence of it ; so far was he from being humbled, that he was wroth with the Seer, and put him in a prison-house ; for he was in a rage with him, because of this thing. And he oppressed some of the people the same time. Nay, he so far abused this testimony of the Divine displeasure, that he hardened himself still more. For it was after this, that in his disease he sought not unto the Lord, but to the physicians ‡. The Lord describes obduracy under judgments, as a fruit and evidence of the treachery of the heart : for when Israel abused his mercies, he tried them with judgments, and these also they abused. Therefore he gives this command to the Prophet ; Go ye up upon her walls, and destroy ; but make not a full end : take away her battlements, for they are not

VOL. I.

H h h

the

* Neh. ix. 28. 29. † Isa. lvii. 18. ‡ 2 Chron. xvi. 7.—12.

the Lord's. For the house of Israel and the house of Judah have dealt very treacherously against me, saith the Lord. They have belied the Lord, and said, It is not he, neither shall evil come upon us, neither shall we see sword nor famine.*

FROM this subject, you, who are under adversity of any kind, may be exhorted to endeavour the discovery of the sin or sins, which may be the procuring causes of God's displeasure. In order to this, earnestly apply to him by prayer, that he may be pleased to let you know the reason of his indignation. Imitate the conduct of Job, while in a most deplorable situation; I will say unto God, Do not condemn me; show me wherefore thou contendest with me †. This was the course that David also observed under a severe public affliction. When there was a famine in the land, he enquired of the Lord; and the Lord answered, It is for Saul, and for his bloody house, because he slew the Gibeonites ‡.—Attend to the voice of conscience, and hearken to its testimony, in regard to the cause of adversity. This is God's deputy within you, a witness, nay, a judge appointed by him to take cognizance, not only of your actions, but of your thoughts. Therefore, it is your duty to give it a fair hearing. The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord, searching all the inward parts of the belly. Conscience is thus described, because it is its proper work to investigate the heart, and to discover what is lurking there. Commune with your own heart. What sin doth conscience most readily charge you with? This, very probably, is the cause of God's anger. The consciences of Joseph's brethren, in the day of their calamity, suggested the reason of it without the least hesitation; They said one to another, We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul, when he besought us; and we would not hear: therefore is this distress come upon us §. They are not satisfied with a confession of their guilt, merely in reference to the time

* Jer. v. 10,—12. † Job. x. 2. ‡ 2 Sam. xxi. 1.

§ Gen. xlii. 21.

time when the crime was committed; they say not, We were guilty. Their severe unmerited treatment from a stranger, brought all the cruelty of their conduct towards the innocent Joseph fresh on their hearts. They perceive the unpurged guilt of their old sin staring them in the face, from under the dark brow of the present threatening dispensation. We are verily guilty concerning our brother.—Diligently consider the nature, manner, and circumstances of the affliction. The sin may be often read in its punishment. In this respect, the nature of the cause appears in the effect. Jacob was deceived by Laban in his marriage. Thus the Lord chastised him for his sinful conduct in the way which he took to obtain the blessing, by deceiving his good old father Isaac. He was himself ensnared by means of the darkness of the night, as he had over-reached his father by reason of the darkness of old age. Rachel, his beloved wife, impatiently said unto him; Give me children, else I die. And the gratifying of her inordinate desire was indeed the cause of her death. Adonibezek was a signal instance of the justice of providential retribution. So strong was his conviction of this, that he was obliged to confess it, although to his shame: *Threescore and ten kings, with their thumbs and great toes cut off, did gather their meat under my table. As I have done, so God hath requited me.

FARTHER, reflect on the temper of your minds, when the affliction was brought on you. Were you languid in the exercise of grace. Then, it was probably such a call as that, How long wilt thou sleep, O sluggard? When wilt thou arise out of thy sleep? The procuring cause of an affliction may be often discovered by a consideration of one's temper, when it was sent. This was remarkably exemplified in the case of Nebuchadnezzar. He walked in the palace of the kingdom of Babylon, and said; Is not this great Babylon that I have built for the house of my kingdom, by the night

* Judges i. 7.

might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty. While the word was in the king's mouth, there fell a voice from heaven, saying, O king Nebuchadnezzar, to thee it is spoken, the kingdom is departed from thee? In the very paroxysm of his vain-glory he was arrested by the messenger from God. And he was afterwards made to acknowledge, that those who walk in pride he is able to abase *.—Compare your situation with that of those who in former times have been afflicted in the same manner, especially if your adversity be of a peculiar nature. If you are guilty of the sins which procured the rod to them, you may with great probability conclude, that it is for these very sins that God afflicts you. For whatsoever things were written aforetime, were written for our learning. So Paul addressing the Corinthians, with respect to the judgments inflicted on the Church of Israel, observes; These things were our examples, to the intent we should not lust after evil things, as they also lusted †. Try what is your beloved sin: and, in a word, examine what are these sins for which you are most frequently reprov'd under the ministry of the gospel. As of old, the Lord did nothing without revealing it to his servants the Prophets, so the secret of the Lord is still with them that fear him. By his Spirit he still makes his word quick and powerful. What is the sin for which conscience most frequently reprov's you under the word, the sin with regard to which you find the word as a burning fire shut up in your bones? You have great reason to view this as the reason of God's controversy.

AGAIN, we exhort you to seek the sanctified use of your afflictions. If they be not sanctified, as you have seen, they will turn out to your hardening in the mean time, and to your greater condemnation in the end. Be earnest in prayer that the Lord would bless them to you, either as means of bringing you within the bond of his covenant, or of building you up in your most holy faith; that he would make them instrumental for the mortification of sin, for strengthening ening grace, and for preparing you to be partakers of his inheritance. You may inquire, how you shall know if afflictions be really sanctified to you? This you may know, by applying to your hearts in the exercise of self-examination some of the observations made in the doctrinal part of this discourse. Do you patiently submit to the will of God, are you preserved from repining under the rod, and in some measure enabled to say; Good is the will of the Lord? Are you made to justify him in all his dispensations, to ascribe righteousness to your Maker, who giveth songs in the night? Are you engaged in self-abasement and self-condemnation? Are you, under affliction, disposed to flee to God in Christ as your only refuge, saying; God is my refuge and my strength, a very present help in time of trouble? Are you more concerned to get adversity sanctified than removed? Can you view affliction as coming out of the hand of a kind and compassionate Father, who doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men? Do your trials increase your hatred of sin? Are you more afraid of the evil of sin, than of that of affliction? Do they increase your love to the Redeemer? Do they influence you to walk more closely with God? Do they stir up the exercise of faith, so that your conduct in some measure corresponds to that of Job; Though he should slay me, yet will I trust in him? Do you reckon your severest trials preferable to a life of sin, like Moses, who chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season? Do you find rest to your soul in God's word? Does your experience keep pace with the Psalmist's; Thy word is all my comfort in mine affliction, and in all my straits I am revived by this thy word alone? If such be your real attainments, however weak the degree, it is a certain evidence that your adversity is among those all things that work together for your good, and that in the end you shall have this song put into your mouth; We went through fire, and through water, but thou broughtest us out at length unto a wealthy place.

* Dan. iv. 29,—31. 37.

† 1 Cor. x. 6.

S E R M O N XXIII.

ON THE DECEITFULNESS OF THE HEART, IN DISREGARDING PROVIDENTIAL DISPENSATIONS IN GENERAL.

PSALM lxxviii. 7, 8.

—And not forget the works of God ;—and might not be as their fathers ;—a generation that set not their heart aright, and whose spirit was not stedfast with God.

GOD addresseth men, whether renewed or unrenewed, in a twofold way ; by Word, and by Providence. These often go hand in hand. He gives a commission to his dispensations to confirm his word. With respect to both, the unrenewed are obstinate, and refuse to hearken. This sin is often eminently chargeable against his own children. Therefore he complains of his Church, not only that she would not listen to his voice, but that she did not regard the operation of his hands. It is, then, of the greatest consequence for us to attend to the deceitfulness of our hearts, as it impedes this necessary exercise.

THE inscription of this Psalm does not absolutely determine whether it was written by Asaph, or only committed to him as one of those set over the service of song in the house of the Lord. But whether he or any any other was the inspired penman, he could only speak as a type of Christ. For the introduction of the Psalm, in its proper extent, could only refer to the great Prophet. He alone could justly say; Give ear, O my people, to my law. That Christ is properly the speaker here is evident from the following words; I will open my mouth in a parable, I will utter dark sayings of old: for these are expressly applied to him in the New Testament*. We learn the reason that these sayings were to be uttered not to that generation only, but to the generation to come. They were given with this design. For he established a testimony in Jacob, and appointed a law in Israel, which he commanded our fathers to make known to their children. And for what end?—That the generation to come might know them. And this was to be done in their successive generations,—that they might set their hope in God, and not forget the works of God, but keep his commandments. Remembering in scripture often signifies, not merely a simple recollection of any thing in the memory, but the desire of the heart; as in Heb. xi. 15. And truly, if they had been mindful of that country from whence they came out, they might have had opportunity to have returned. But now they desire a better country. The latter expression, desire, explains the meaning of the former, mindful. Remembering God often signifies true faith and religion; Isa. xlii. 21. Remember these things, O Jacob, &c. Remembrance sometimes denotes the engagement of the whole heart with any object; as in Song i. 4. We will remember thy love more than wine. On the other hand, to forget God metaphorically signifies unbelief and opposition to him in general, Hof. iv. 6. Thou hast forgotten the law of thy God. The forgetfulness here meant does not denote a mere neglect, but a positive rejection: for this declaration is thus prefaced, Thou hast rejected knowledge. Forgetting the works of God seems especially to signify, either first, a contempt or disregard of them in the mean time.

* Matt. xiii. 34, 35.

time; thus consideration is directly opposed to forgetfulness, Pſal. l. 22.—or, ſecondly, a ſuffering them to ſlip out of the mind, whatever impreſſions they have made at firſt. And ſometimes it includes both. That it is not the firſt merely that is meant here is evident from this, that not forgetting the works of God, and keeping his commandments, are joined together. They were ſo to remember his works as thereby to ſtir themſelves up to obedience. They were to remember the works of God, that they might not be like their fathers a ſtifnecked and rebellious race. We have the great reaſon of a contempt of God's operations in the mean time, or forgetfulneſs of them afterwards, in the words that follow;—a generation that ſet not their heart aright, and whoſe ſpirit was not ſtedfaſt with God. Their heart was not ſet aright, it was not prepared, as the word may be read. It was not renewed by a work of grace. Therefore it was that all the works of Providence made ſo little impreſſion. Their ſpirit was not ſtedfaſt. They often ſeemed to look well, and they ſpoke well; but there was not ſuch a heart in them. They dealt deceitfully with God; for as their character is more fully delineated, verſe 34.—37. when they ſeemed to be anxiously ſeeking after God, they only flattered him with their mouth, and lied unto him with their tongues: for their heart was not right with him, neither were they ſtedfaſt in his covenant.

THESE words afford the following propoſition, That the want of a right heart, or to expreſs it otherwiſe, the deceit of the heart is the great reaſon that men do not obſerve the works of God.

As this part of the ſubject is of great importance, and little attended to by the generality, even of real Chriſtians, it may not be improper to view it with conſiderable extent. We may,

I. SHOW

I. SHOW what is implied in a diligent observation of providential dispensations.

II. ILLUSTRATE some of the deceits employed by the heart for preventing this exercise.

III. CONSIDER its designs in dissuading us from it.

IV. OFFER some encouragements to this necessary work.

V. SUBJOIN some cautions as to the interpretation of the language of Providence.

I. SUCH a diligent observation implies,

1. A CLOSE investigation of the various steps of Providence towards us. The Providence of God may be viewed either as common or special. His common Providence extends to all creatures, the wicked not excepted. The Lord is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works *. But there is a special Providence exercised toward his people. The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them †. His eyes run to and fro throughout the whole earth, to show himself strong in behalf of them whose heart is perfect towards him ‡. This special care extends in some measure to elect vessels, even while they are in the state of nature; in their merciful preservation from death, and from the unpardonable sin, till the time of the accomplishment of his purpose of love concerning them. The Providence of God, though exercised in a common manner towards the unregenerate, is by them habitually disregarded. It is, therefore, his special Providence with respect to the Saints which we have principally in our eye; as they alone will be concerned to attend to his dispensations. Now, it is necessary that they should carefully observe the whole of his procedure, not as if they could clearly perceive his gracious hand in every particular event which

* Psal. cxlv. 9.

† Psal. xxxiv. 7.

‡ 2 Chron. xvi. 9.

befals them, but because they must in this Christian exercise express their desire of discovering his hand, and wait for the display of it. That preservation, protection, leading or support which others receive from God as the common Preserver of men, comes to them from their own God and Father, dealing with them according to the Covenant of Grace, and making all things work together for good. There are many events, indeed, which are so trivial, that Christians cannot immediately discern the hand of God in them: but there are others not more important in themselves, which, in their connection, discover not only Divine co-operation, but infinite wisdom and distinguishing love. It is their duty still to look for a display of his merciful operation, and in this exercise they will learn to see it more and more. We may speak more fully on this head afterwards. At present we shall only mention the following things, which may be useful to the believer in his endeavours to discover a gracious Providence in particular dispensations. He ought to be firmly and constantly persuaded that the Lord is dealing with him in a way of love, and that all things which befall him, though he cannot presently discern the design of them, do actually proceed from his God and Father, and concur in preparing him for the inheritance of the saints in light. A constant belief of this great and delightful truth will sharpen his desire for a discovery of the Divine procedure in the whole of life. Again, those dispensations that respect natural life, health, sickness, or the exercise of his rational faculties, he can be in no danger of misinterpreting, when he views them as having a peculiar concurrence of love attending them. Those also which tend to discover sin, to reprove for it, to quicken grace, to alienate our hearts from the world, may safely and without exception be viewed as dispensations of Providence which we are called especially to observe. To these may be added all such as contain evident answers of prayer.

2. Attention to the temper of our hearts, to the dictates of conscience, and to the motions of the Holy Spirit, which concur with these dispensations, are also necessary. It is not enough that we view any particular providence as coming out of the hand of God, or that we believe his love in it. We must compare the outward dispensation with the temper of the heart while it befalls us, that we may obtain a just view of it. When, for example, an event takes place which hath a tendency to humble us in our own apprehensions, and to lay us in the dust before God; we should turn our eyes inward, and carefully examine whether we have in any respect been indulging pride; because the dispensation evidently seems to contain this language. Are we deeply wounded by a discovery of the coolness, instability, or perfidy of an earthly friend? Let us diligently inquire, if we have not been placing too much confidence in man, expecting more solace from the creature than it can afford, and thus provoking the Lord, by making flesh our arm? For this is undoubtedly the voice of such a heart-corroding trial. Nor is it sufficient that we try the secret workings of the heart. We must also listen to the voice of conscience, summon it impartially to give in its testimony against us, and hear what it has to accuse us of before God. If we lay a restraint upon conscience, if we stifle its suggestions; we take the most effectual way to prevent a proper discovery of the design of the dispensation. Nor ought we to satisfy ourselves with receiving the testimony of conscience. It is necessary that we attend to the motions of the Holy Spirit in us. It is the privilege of all true Christians to be led by the Spirit. He not only leads them externally by a gracious Providence, but internally by correspondent suggestions, pointing out the design of the outward dispensations; and all these are correspondent to his standing testimony in the Word. We must, therefore, be exceedingly careful not to quench the Spirit, by whom we are sealed to the day of redemption. These precious inward influences concur with the outward methods of Providence, by discovering the design of them, as levelled at some particular sin, the knowledge or mortification of which is necessary; or as requiring the more vigorous exercise of some grace. To recur to an example formerly mentioned;—do the motions of the Spirit tend to humble us before God, as abominable by reason of any one sin, or of our sins viewed collectively, in correspondence with an outward dispensation of an humbling nature? Then we may be assured that the intention of God in this method of procedure is really to increase our self-abasement.

concur

3. AN accurate trial of the meaning of all dispensations by the infallible standard of revelation. We have already observed, that Providence is a commentary on the Word. But we must still remember that the Word is the text. As no scripture is of any private interpretation; as little is any providence. We must not interpret the Divine procedure according to our own fancies or humours, but according to the law and the testimony. When the Church meets with severe dispensations, we are not thence in unbelief to conclude that the Lord hath forsaken her; but to bring his providence to the light of such a gracious promise; By this shall the iniquity of Jacob be purged; and this is all the fruit, to take away his sin: even although the dispensation should be so severe, that he should make all the stones of the altar as chalk-stones that are beaten in sunder *. When we wish to learn the reason of public afflictions, we will receive light from such a declaration as this; Your iniquities have separated between you and your God. We are to apply the same rule, as to those dispensations that immediately regard ourselves. In the cxi. Psalm, which especially respects the works of God, we find the Psalmist observing this method. He traces up the gracious preservation of the Saints to the stability of the covenant: He hath given meat to them that fear him: he will ever be mindful of his covenant †. He compares the faithfulness and and equity of his providential conduct with the truth and stedfastness of his Word: The works of his hands are verity and judgment: all his commandments are sure: they stand fast for ever and ever, and are done in truth and uprightness *.

* Isa. xxvii. 9.

† Verse 5.

4. AN earnest desire of perceiving God's design as of a loving nature. We should not be merely concerned to discover his design as in itself, or as respecting any particular object, any sin, grace or duty; nor should we rest satisfied with believing his love in the general tenor of Providence; but we should labour to know the love that God hath to us in every dispensation. It ought to be our constant aim, in observing the course of his procedure with us, to receive confirming evidences of his love. We have the Divine authority for believing that the diligent observation of Providence is one principal way of obtaining such gracious discoveries. For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God †. This leading not only includes the work of the Spirit in the heart in mortifying sin, mentioned in the preceding verse; but all the means which the Spirit employs for accomplishing this work, among which we may justly reckon Providence. Now, those who are thus led by the Spirit, who experience his conduct in outward dispensations, as all working for their good, have the most comfortable evidence of their near relation to God. In this way doth the Spirit eminently bear witness with our spirits that we are the sons of God; by discovering love in all events, and making them subservient for quickening us in the delightful exercise of crying, Abba, father, whatever be his course with us in the world. When, by the operation of the Spirit, along with the Word, in our hearts, we see every providence impressed with Divine love to us, and promoting our sanctification, it is a testimony of sonship which is certain and infallible.

5. A FAITHFUL recording of these dispensations. It

is

* Psal. cxi. 7, 8. † Rcm. viii. 14.

is not enough that we observe them in the mean time. We must so treasure them up in our hearts or memories, as to be able to bring them forth, when there is occasion for them afterwards. It is best to have them engraved on the heart; for when they are thus deeply impressed by the power of the Spirit, they will never be forgotten. But it may be very useful to Christians to keep what is called a diary, and regularly to commit to writing what they experience of the love of God to them, not merely in their own exercise, but in his providential dispensations. As we are in great danger of forgetting them, we need to use every proper help. While this plan may be observed for their own advantage in future, they ought to exercise great prudence in keeping these memorials to themselves, unless there be a very clear call to the contrary; lest any improprieties in them should afford ground of ridicule to an irreligious world. So much was Job concerned to observe and remember the Divine dispensations towards him that he breaks out in this vehement exclamation; O! that my words were now written; O! that they were printed in a book; that they were engraven with an iron pen and lead in the rock for ever *. If Samuel was so much interested in the external management of the kingdom of Israel, that he told the people the manner of the kingdom, and wrote it in a book, and laid it up before the Lord †, how much more should we be concerned to record the manner of God's spiritual kingdom, of that kingdom which is within us, and his various methods of managing it, and to lay up before the Lord this memorial of his wisdom, power, and love. If this method be observed, it is most proper to record these things when they are fresh in the memory, and when we are impressed, not only with the providences themselves, but with all their concurrent circumstances, and with a clear view of God's gracious design in measuring them out to us. Thus did the Israelites, when recently delivered at the Red Sea, of which we have an account, Exod. xiv. The chapter immediately

* Job. xix. 23.

† 1 Sam. x. 25.

diately following begins with these words: Then sang Moses and the children of Israel this song unto the Lord, and spake, saying, I will sing unto the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously. Why are we so often told that the ancient worthies set up pillars in commemoration of particular events? These things were undoubtedly written for our learning, and teach us that we ought to record the mighty acts of the Lord. When he delivered the children of Israel from the Philistines, Samuel took a stone and set it between Mizpeh and Shen, and called the name of it Ebenezer, that is, a stone of remembrance, saying, Hitherto hath the Lord helped us *. The same example we have in the conduct of Jacob, Joshua, and others. In a word, Moses delivered one charge to the Israelites, with respect to their tedious, dangerous, and perplexed sojourning in the wilderness, which is strongly descriptive of the duty of every spiritual Israelite: Thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness †.

WE now proceed, II. to illustrate some of the deceits practised by the heart, in order to prevent a diligent observation of providential dispensations.

I. IT entices us to indifference about practical religion. Always when men are careless about the power of godliness in their hearts, they are negligent with respect to the Divine procedure towards them: for it requires some constant measure of liveliness in the service of God to dispose one to a diligent observation of his providential conduct. The languid Christian will never be an attentive Christian. It is as vain to expect this as to suppose that a watchman, while asleep on his tower, should anxiously guard against danger, and narrowly inspect every passing object. A man spiritually asleep, as to the exercise of grace in his own soul, cannot have his eyes open on the methods which God observes with respect to him in his Providence. He will either altogether disregard his operations, or interpret them falsely. It is the lively, the vigorous Christian alone, who will not only observe outward dispensations, but compare them with the present situation of his heart, with the testimony of his conscience, with the rule of the Word, and with the motions of the Holy Spirit within him; and trace the footsteps of Divine love in all the paths of the Lord his God. While the grace of faith was asleep as to its exercise in the heart of Peter, he could neither observe nor understand the meaning of Providence. He knew not that the inquiries of the servants in the judgment-hall had all their direction from God himself, and were designed for proving his attachment to Christ. He did not perceive that this trial was sent to humble him in his own apprehension, and to discover to him the folly of his presumptuous imaginations and vain-glorious declarations. Never till his injured Master looked on him in love and compassion, and dispelled the languor of grace in his soul, did he understand his design in suffering him to be so closely questioned and so firmly accused by the officious servants of the High-priest, to deny his Lord, and even to go the dreadful length of cursing and swearing that he knew not the man. Then he not only considered the meaning of this dispensation, but compared it with what Jesus had formerly spoken. He remembered the words of the Lord, and went out and wept bitterly *. If the deceitful heart once prevail with us to become negligent in the exercise of grace, the neglect of Divine dispensations is the unavoidable consequence.

is

* 1 Sam. vii. 12.

† Deut. viii. 2.

2. IT represents them as uncertain. There is so much atheism in the heart of man, that he is prone to attribute many things to mere chance or accident. This is a nonentity, which receives almost universal homage. For, inquire at those who believe in the doctrine of mere Chance, what they mean by it? And they will honestly tell you, they mean nothing at all. Any thing that cannot be accounted for on natural principles, or according to the common course of events, is ascribed to this phantom of the imagination. But we must either deny the immensity and universal influence of God, or confess that there can be no such thing as Chance in the world; because there cannot be two ruling principles of action, both possessed of universal influence, and especially, opposed to each other in nature and operations. Either Chance presides over all the actions and circumstances of human life, and Providence over none of them; or Providence over all, and Chance over none. There are, indeed, many things which are contingent to us, as nowise resulting from the intervention of secondary causes, or not influenced by these, in any way discernible by us. But whatever is accidental to us, must be resolved into a supreme and all-wise Providence, which over-rules all actions and events; and actually concurs, either by employing secondary causes, though we cannot observe them, or by working without their agency. It must, therefore, be said of Chance, that idol to which so many oblations are made, as the Apostle declares with respect to all false deities, that it is nothing in the world. For, indeed, this very Chance, which is supposed to have so great an influence in human affairs, was one of the false deities that the heathens worshipped. They acknowledged it by the name of Fortune. And it must be confessed, that herein they were more rational than many, who call themselves Christians: for though they could not account for those operations which they ascribed to it, conscience seems to have declared that they must owe their existence to a first cause, to a God, however much unknown. May we not add, that their faith bears a greater resemblance to the Apostle's, than that of the believers in Chance, when he declares concerning God; In him we live, and move, and have our being? This, indeed, was originally the language of one of their own poets. It must be granted, that some of their Philosophers went to the shocking extreme of deifying every part of matter. But this ridiculous idea evidently originated from the corruption of a most important doctrine, the universality of Providence. And it is very questionable, whether this opinion, gross as it is, exceeds in absurdity the doctrine of mere Chance. Did not men live without God in the world, they would not blindly deny his universal superintendence, and ascribe to a mere chimæra the influence which proceeds from that Being who is every where present. So blind, so atheistical and deceitful is the heart, that even those who not only believe a Providence, and disbelieve Chance, but who endeavour to observe the workings of Providence, are often ready to reject them, from the idea of uncertainty. They find it difficult to allow the Divine concurrence in particular actions, because they cannot discern it. But as this proceeds from no other principle, than that natural blindness in the mind which tends to absolute atheism; it acknowledges no better reason than that which disposes man to disbelieve the being of God altogether; even his invisible nature. But, if we credit the testimony of Scripture, why should we be at a loss to believe his concurrence in particular events, when it assures us, not only of his superintendence over all, but of his agency with respect to all, in one way or another? From the place of his habitation he looketh upon all the inhabitants of the earth. He fashioneth their hearts alike: he considereth all their works *.—A man's heart deviseth his way, but the Lord directeth his steps †.

of

* Luke xxii. 61, 62.

3. THE heart represents many events as trifling and unworthy of attention. Many, who believe in general, that all things which befall them are over-ruled by God, are notwithstanding ready to apprehend that it is derogatory to his dignity, to suppose that he should have a particular design in those events, which are in themselves of little consequence. But shall we not believe that his Providence extends even to the smallest matters; when he hath declared, that the grass of the field, which is trodden under foot of man and beast, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven,

* Ps. xxxiii. 14.

† Prov. xvi. 9.

oven, is clothed by God; that the very hairs of our heads are all numbered, however insignificant and innumerable to us; that so trifling a creature as a sparrow, does not fall on the ground without our Father, without his knowledge, concurrence, and immediate agency*; and when the smallest and vilest of his creatures are made the ministers of his will, and the executioners of his judgments, as in the fatal experience of the Egyptians †? Indeed, we cannot form any just apprehension of Providence, without thinking of it as in every respect particular. To suppose that God pays no regard to those actions that are comparatively trivial, is to deny his Providence entirely. For, as by his omnipresence, he must fill every part of the universe at the same moment, in every part his influence must be exerted. The eye of Omniscience must necessarily include every object, even the minutest; else it could not deserve the name. The hand of Omnipotence must comprehend in its grasp the most despicable atom floating in the air, as really as the stars in their courses; else it would be limited in power and operation: as the same bright luminary, which enlightens the palace, darts its rays through the crevices of the dungeon, and equally exhales the nauseous steams of the dunghill with the fragrant fluids of the garden. And if Divine Providence extends to the smallest matters, shall we suppose that it does so without design? This, indeed, would be to derogate from the infinite wisdom of God, as the Governor of the world: for we cannot ascribe infinite wisdom to a Being, who does any thing without design, or without relation to an end. If it is not dishonouring to God to believe that he superintends the minutest objects; surely it cannot be anywise inconsistent with those apprehensions that we ought to entertain of his greatness, to believe that he hath a special intention in all the actions performed under his influence. Do we not often see that those things which are trivial in themselves, lead to the greatest events, events, and are necessarily connected with them? Christians, by an attentive observation of things, which others pass over without the smallest notice, will often perceive the most insignificant means directly leading to the most important ends.

* Mat. x. 29. † Exod. viii. 16.—17.

Who could have thought, that such a rich cluster of illustrious providences would have been suspended on so trifling a circumstance, as that of Joseph's being the favourite child of his father;—providences big with the fate, not only of the whole family of Jacob, but of the most considerable portion of the Church of God then in the world;—necessary, according to the Divine purpose, to the very existence of that people who were afterwards to be consecrated as peculiar to himself, and to the accomplishment of that one promise, in which all revelation concentrated, the birth of that seed in whom all the families of the earth should be blessed? Who could have imagined that an event, apparently so accidental, as that of the Ishmaelites passing by, while Joseph was in the pit, which suggested to Judah the more gentle idea of selling him, should have been indispensably connected with all those great events, that were requisite for the salvation of the Church of God in every age? Every minute circumstance of the treatment of Joseph, was necessary to form a link in that glorious chain, which led to the completion of God's purposes and promises. Had he not been the favourite of his father, he would not have been hated of his brethren; had he not been hated, they would not have cast him into a pit; had not the Ishmaelites passed by at this very time, he might have perished there; had he not been sold to them, he would not have been carried into Egypt and sold there; had he not been sold to the captain of Pharaoh's guard, he would not, through the revenge of his baffled mistress, have been cast into that prison where the king's prisoners were bound; had he not been cast into that very prison, he would not have been acquainted with the king's butler; had not the king's butler dreamed, Joseph would not have been known to him as an an interpreter of dreams ; had he not been thus known to him, such a mean person must have remained a stranger to Pharaoh ; had not Pharaoh known and believed him, he could not have provided against the famine, he could not have saved his father's house, he could not have given them a place in Egypt, the Church of God could not have been tried in that iron furnace, and delivered from it by an astonishing display of Almighty power. There was a collateral link in this chain, which must not be forgotten. What is more despised, and in general more despicable than a dream ? Yet had not Pharaoh had a dream which troubled him, the butler would not have remembered Joseph ; had he not remembered him, Pharaoh would not have applied to him for the interpretation of his dream, Joseph might have rotted in prison, Egypt would most likely have been consumed by the famine, and the seed of the Church would have perished. So striking are all these circumstances, and so closely connected, that it is difficult to believe that any rational person should read this history, and yet retain a doubt of a particular Providence. We are sure there was none in the mind of Joseph. He considered all these things as taking place under the direction of infinite wisdom. This very consideration did he use, for comforting the troubled hearts of his brethren, after he had revealed himself to them ; Be not grieved, nor angry with yourselves, for—God sent me before you, to preserve you a posterity in the earth, and to save your lives by a great deliverance. So, now, it was not you that sent me hither, but God *. And, afterwards ; As for you, you thought evil against me, but God meant it unto good, to bring to pass, as at this day, to save much people alive †. It would scarcely seem worth the observing, that even a king should lose his rest for a single night. Yet this circumstance with respect to Ahasuerus, immediately led to the preservation of Mordecai, and to the disappointment and disgrace of the haughty and revengeful Haman ; nay, concurred with other circumstances, in accomplishing the destruction of this adversary, and the deliverance and enlargement of the people of God *.

with

* Gen. xlv. 8. † Gen. l. 20.

4. It opposes this exercise, as if it unavoidably tended to enthusiasm. In this light will the children of this world, at any rate, consider it, because God is not in all their thoughts. Need it then appear surprising, that they should never think of observing him in their lives? But as the wickedness of the heart is essentially the same in all, even the children of light are often prompted, by their corruption, to disregard the operations of the Lord, under the pretence of its tendency to Enthusiasm. The greatest Christians, through the prevailing weakness and ignorance of their minds, or perhaps from present fear, arising from a sense of guilt, may be ready at times to put a construction on particular events that they will not justly bear, a construction very remote from the intention of God. But this is no argument against the thing itself. There is no Enthusiasm in setting the Lord before us, and in a diligent observation of the whole tenor of his conduct. Some degree of Enthusiasm may steal into the best duties of believers, and be very prejudicial to them. But bad and dangerous as this extreme is, it is preferable to that of indifference. It is safer to be in some instances righteous overmuch, than to disregard religion altogether. One had much better mistake God's language in any particular dispensation, than entirely neglect the designs of Providence. That is a cloud which may obscure his way for a moment; but this is a path of darkness in which he gropes and stumbles continually. Who would not rather chuse to suffer a temporary glimmering of his eyes from the lustre of the sun, than to be totally deprived of the use of them by a perpetual midnight darkness? There can be no Enthusiasm in a strict observation of the ways of the Lord, unless it be Enthusiasm to believe a particular Providence, influencing and over-ruling all events. For, if we believe this,

instead

* Est. vi. 1.

instead of being Enthusiasts in endeavouring to trace it, we are practical Infidels, if we act otherwise. If in the one case, we do not believe too much, which has been formerly proved; in the other, we act as if we believed nothing at all. That sort of religion only is Enthusiasm, which hath no foundation in the Scriptures. But if the belief of a particular Providence, and of the necessity of observing it, is to be rejected under this notion; we at one throw reject the whole of religion, refuse the authority of the Word of God, and virtually deny his very being. For if any of his works are excluded from his observation, his kingdom ruleth not over all. And if we deny the universality of his kingdom, we must necessarily deny his Imminity. If all things, even the most minute and insignificant, were created by God with infinite wisdom and power; if all his creatures were very good, in reference to the end proposed; the same wisdom, power, and design, must we attribute to God, in the preservation and government of them all.

5. THIS constant observation of Providence, is represented as a great bondage to ourselves. Well knows the deceitful heart, that if Christians were more diligent in the observation, and faithful in the remembrance of providential dispensations, it would greatly tend to the further discovery and mortification of its own deceitfulness: therefore, it opposes this course with the greatest ardour. It makes not a single objection to the expence of time and labour in its own service; but it has a thousand to the smallest expence of either in the service of God. When the Christian is disposed to this vigilant attention, it proposes the same question with Judas; Wherefore is all this waste? And for the same reason too. For as Judas was a thief, and wanted to have the money for his own purposes; the design of the treacherous heart, in complaining of this waste of time and trouble in observing Providence, is, that both may be solely devoted to itself. It wishes to deprive the Christian of that precious precious spikenard, that excellent oil of the holy Spirit, which would often be poured upon him in the exercise of this spiritual diligence, and diffuse its fragrance all around. It complains of this as a bondage, because it really views the whole of God's service in this light, and especially every thing that tends to excite the Christian to fervency and watchfulness: for it vehemently wishes to break God's bands asunder, and cast away his cords. It dreads the careful observation of Providence, and of Divine love attending it, as a bond that would often restrain the violence of iniquity. But it is entirely false that this is a bondage. Indeed, it requires a strict and minute attention, a careful investigation of circumstances. But the concurrence between the Providence of God, and the operations of the Spirit on the heart, is often so clear and distinct, that it strikes our eye whether we will or not; and is observed by us, even when, from reluctance to be reprov'd, we wish to overlook it; or to have our heart averted from any purpose agreeable to its inclinations, though evidently oppos'd by God. The language of Providence is frequently so loud, as to make the most deaf to hear. Its operations are at times so perspicuous, that he who runs may read them. This commandment, instead of being grievous, is in the course of obedience attended with the greatest delight. Can any thing be more pleasing to the saint of God, than by a diligent inspection of his providential management, to see all his ways to be truth and mercy; all things working together for his own good; and every dispensation proceeding from God as a merciful and compassionate Father? Shall we suppose a dutiful and grateful child, to esteem it a bondage to recollect and ponder in his mind the many instances of his parent's affection; to consider the love that is in his frowns, as well as in his endearments; and to survey the whole of his conduct, as conducive to his own real interest and happiness? And shall the children of an heavenly Father, deem it burdensome to reflect on that pity and tenderness tenderness that he manifests to them, when they know that he loves them infinitely more than the most tender earthly parent, and that all his dispensations are just the proofs which he gives, that *as far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed their transgressions from them? Though this exercise should at first be attended with some difficulty; yet by means of prayer, vigilance and perseverance, their spiritual discernment and experience will be so increased, as to render the work far more easy and delightful. There is a progress in this as in every other part of the Christian exercise. The path of the just is as the shining light that shineth more and more unto a perfect day. And we know that all the ways of wisdom are pleasantness.

6. THE heart may perhaps plead that this course is neglected by many who are as good Christians as we. It is the ruin of many, that they take their fellow-professors as an example, especially if they are esteemed saints. They think that if they go as far in religion as they do, they may rest satisfied: and they generally propose them as patterns in those things wherein they are most deficient. They look at the worst things about them, and consider these as warrants for their practice. The deceitfulness of the heart thus seeks to shield itself under the pretence of walking by the footsteps of the flock. Those who are led astray by it, in this instance, consider not in how many things such Christians exceed them. They only attend to these circumstances, in which, through prevailing infirmity, or perhaps, from the power of temptations to which themselves are strangers, they are on a level with them. But this is a false rule of conduct; for we are only to follow Christians as far as they follow Christ. Paul, though an eminent saint, and not behind the chief of the Apostles, could only propose himself as an example as far as his conduct was consistent with that of the great pattern: Be ye followers of me, as I also am of Christ. In following others we are also to carry this direction along with us; that instead of viewing their infirmities as a warrant for indulging the like in ourselves, we ought to improve them as means for exciting us to greater diligence and watchfulness; because sin or folly never appears in so striking a light as in the most exalted characters. *Dead flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savour; so doth a little folly him that is in reputation for wisdom and honour. Instead of viewing their superior worth as a reason why we should copy their faults, we should consider it as an excitement to follow them in those things only that are most worthy of imitation. Besides, this is a dangerous rule, because we have not the spirit of discernment. We may form an opinion with respect to the state of fellow-professors; but we have no test that is absolutely certain. The only perfect pattern is Christ himself. He hath left us an example that we should follow his steps. While we are to follow others only as they follow him; we are to follow him without any limitation. And without the smallest reserve he could say; I have set the Lord always before me. Hence it was, that his holy human soul had the continual comfort of observing that the Lord maintained his lot, that amidst all his adversities the lines had fallen happily to him in pleasant places, and that the Lord was always at his right hand†. What unspeakable delight must he have had in viewing all the lines of that extraordinary providence that environed him, as terminating in the completion of those illustrious prophecies which acknowledged him as their subject?—As the conduct of the great Head is the only perfect example, the Word of God is the only infallible rule. Neither the opinions, nor the practices of the best of saints are to be our Bible. We ought to respect the one, and imitate the other, in subordination to this unerring standard. This is that sure word of prophecy to which we do well to take heed.

S E R-

* Eccl. x. 1.

† Psal. xvi. 5. 6. 8.

S E R M O N XXIV.

ON THE DECEITFULNESS OF THE HEART, IN DISREGARDING PROVIDENTIAL DISPENSATIONS IN GENERAL.

PSALM lxxviii. 7, 8.

—And not forget the works of God ;—and might not be as their fathers ;—a generation that set not their heart aright, and whose spirit was not stedfast with God.

III. WE are now to advert to the designs of the deceitful heart in dissuading us from observing divine dispensations.

FIRST, It wishes to deprive God of the glory resulting from this exercise. His great object in all dispensations, as in all his works without exception, is to glorify his own name. *All men shall fear, and shall declare the work of God; for they shall wisely consider of his doings. The righteous shall be glad in the Lord, and shall trust in him; and all the upright in heart shall glory. The heart still wishes to arrogate praise to itself. Therefore, it labours to deprive God of the glory of his wisdom in directing and managing these dispensations. Where they are not observed and recorded, that infinite wisdom which often appears in them, passes unnoticed. Men see nothing more in the most striking events, than in the most ordinary actions or occurrences of life. The glory of his power is also disregarded. Though particular providences providences be accomplished in so illustrious a manner, as to declare that they proceed from no other than that God who worketh all things according to the counsel of his will, and who doth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth; yet the children of men, by neglecting them, pour contempt on that excellence in working. The revenue of glory, which is due to the love of God, is also refused. Though he be following his people with tokens of his mercy, surrounding them with loving kindness, and making all his paths to drop down fatness; yet by disregarding his work, they ungratefully deny him the praise.

* Psal. lxiv. 9. 10.

SECONDLY, By this inexcusable negligence the delusive heart designs to deprive believers of much real comfort. There are two channels in which the Lord communicates consolation to his people. These are his Word and Providence. But we lose much of our comfort, if we keep these separate. When the one is made to pour its abundance into the other, the peace of believers is *like a river, and their glory like a flowing stream The dispensations of Providence confirm the truth of the Word; while the Word discovers the meaning, and regulates us as to the improvement of these. There is an awful threatening pronounced against such as pay no attention to these things: Because they regard not the works of the Lord, nor the operation of his hands, he shall destroy them, and not build them up †. This, indeed, has a principal reference to the wicked. But it frequently obtains a partial completion even with respect to the children of God, because of their shameful negligence: and its efficacy is visible in their mournful deadness and want of comfort in the ways of God. Again it is said; They regard not the work of the Lord, neither consider the operation of his hands. Therefore, my people are gone into captivity, because they have no knowledge; and their honourable men are famished, and their multitude dried up with thirst ‡. This is one great cause of

the

* Isa. lxvi. 12.

† Psa. xxviii. 5.

‡ Isa. v. 12, 13.

the spiritual captivity, languor and barrenness of many true Christians. On this account is their moisture turned into the drougt of summer. We shall mention some of the comforts which they would derive from this exercise. of which the deceitfulness of the heart deprives them by lulling them into habitual negligence.

I. DILIGENT observation would eminently open up the mystery of Providence. Here there is a great and unknown depth. Many dispensations befall us and others which we cannot fathom. But though the mystery of Providence in its full extent, even as to any individual, is in the present state incomprehensible to us; yet we might attain a far greater knowledge of it, were we sufficiently diligent. For the secret of the Lord is with them that fear him. By discovering the secret of Providence in one dispensation, we might have a key that would be useful in unlocking others. Therefore it is said; *Who is wise, and he shall understand these things? prudent, and he shall know them? for the ways of the Lord are right, and the just shall walk in them: but the transgressors shall fall therein. It is evident that these words refer not only to the commandments and ordinances of God, but to his dispensations. In another place he puts a question nearly of the same import with this, which clearly implies that the spiritually wise will know the meaning of his judgments: Who is the wise man that may understand this,—for what the land perisheth, and is burnt up like a wilderness, that none passeth through †. With respect to these events that are to take place in the latter days, it is declared to Daniel; None of the wicked shall understand, but the wise shall understand ‡? For want of a due observation of former dispensations, we are often at a loss in regard to those that afterwards take place, and in danger of stumbling; as was the case with the disciples, when in the absence of Christ they were ready to perish in a storm. He went up unto them into the ship, and the wind ceased ; and they were sore amazed in themselves beyond measure, and wondered. For they considered not the miracle of the loaves, for their hearts were hardened*.

* Hof. xiv. 9.

† Jer. ix. 12.

‡ Dan. xii. 10.

2. IT tends to increase a holy fear of God. When his judgments are visibly written, according to the threatenings of the word, in the destruction of those who are his open enemies, they often produce this effect. When God shoots at the wicked with an arrow, so that they make their own tongue to fall upon themselves ; it is declared, that all men shall fear, and shall declare the work of God †. When he gives remarkable deliverance to his people, sends such redemption to his folk, that it is thence undeniable that he hath commanded his covenant for ever ; they are at no loss to draw this inference ; Holy and reverend is his name ‡. Even the heathen mariners feared JEHOVAH exceedingly, when they saw his wonderful works with respect to his rebellious prophet §.

THIS is an illustrious mean of discovering Divine love. In the cvii. Psalm, we have a particular enumeration of many of the methods of Providence with respect to the children of men. It contains a striking account of various afflictive dispensations, whether temporal or spiritual, of the conduct of those who are exercised with them, and of the manner in which God is pleased to grant deliverance. At the close of each description, there is a repetition of this pathetic wish ; Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men. This is very far from being a vain repetition. There is a peculiar beauty and propriety in it, as undoubtedly declaring that the great design of God, in these varied operations, is to illustrate his goodness, compassion and long-suffering, and to secure a revenue of glory to himself. To encourage his people to an attentive observation of the whole of his conduct, as peculiarly tending to illustrate his covenant-love, this descriptive descriptive and eucharistic song is concluded with these remarkable words; *Whoso is wise, and will observe * these things, even they shall understand the loving kindness of the Lord.*

* Mark vi. 51. 52. † Psal. lxiv. 7.—9. ‡ Psal. cxi. 9.

§ Jonah i. 16.

4. THIS exercise tends greatly to strengthen faith. This grace, indeed, in all its actings rests on the Word of God as its foundation. But it does not reject assistance from other quarters. Particularly, it derives much confirmation from an experience of divine love in the dispensations of Providence. While it adheres closely to the Word as its proper foundation, with this it compares these dispensations, views them as illustrations of its truth, and thus draws in support to itself. Nay, we may say that it belongs to the direct and proper exercise of faith, to compare Providence with Revelation; and from the correspondent operations of the one, to assure itself of the unchangeable faithfulness of the other. It is just by bringing the ways of the Lord to the rule of his word, and observing the perfect conformity between them, that faith discovers the equity of them all. Hence it is, that the Church can sing this song; He is the Rock, his work is perfect; all his ways are judgment; a God of truth and without iniquity; just and right is he †. Thus the believer is persuaded of the infinite justice of all God's proceedings, not merely from the testimony of his word viewed by itself, but as confirmed by his works. In the same sense, the Prophet Habakkuk, when considering the conduct of God towards his Church, cries out; His ways are everlasting ‡: because, how various soever they be, and though they may seem even to cross each other, they all directly lead to the accomplishment of one eternal and immutable purpose

* THIS word does not merely denote attention in the meantime, but such an observation of any thing, as conveys the idea of treasuring it up in the memory, and of pondering it often in the mind. In this sense, it seems to be used Genesis xxxvii. 11. with respect to Joseph's dream; "His father observed the saying." It frequently signifies the careful preservation or observation of any thing as sacred. Thus it is often used with respect to a solemn oath, and to the covenant of God.

† Deut. xxxii. 4.

‡ Hab. iii. 6.

purpose of love, as their happy end. To this agrees the testimony of the Psalmist; All the paths of the Lord are mercy and truth to such as keep his covenant and his testimonies *. They are not only mercy, as leading to their complete salvation; but truth as directly confirming his word. Not one step of his conduct with respect to them, is inconsistent with one promise in the Bible. Not one good word of all that he hath spoken can fail. When the Christian sees one mercy, one deliverance, whether of a temporal or spiritual nature, coming from God as love, in confirmation of his promise, and in answer to the expectation and prayer of faith; it hath a wonderful and most delightful influence, in encouraging him to the renewed and continued exercise of faith. Then he can more cheerfully join with David; Into thine hand I commit my spirit. And what is the present excitement? Thou hast redeemed me, O God of truth †. “Thou hast already discovered thy faithfulness in the accomplishment of the promise; thou hast never hitherto disappointed my faith.” Sinners themselves are sometimes made to know the justice of God from his providential dispensations. The hearts of the sons of Jacob, when they had sold Joseph, were so obdurate, that they seem to have used every mean to aggravate their father’s affliction. They sent him his coat of many colours, dipped in blood; as if they meant by this very circumstance to reproach him for his partiality. For a long course of years, they appear to have no compunctions with respect to their conduct. But at length they see their sin, and the justice of God, in the peculiarity of their punishment. They had dealt roughly with a brother. A stranger, as they suppose, is raised up to avenge his quarrel, and speaks roughly to them. They had cast their brother into a pit, because they looked on him as a spy on their conduct; for he brought unto his father their evil report. They are themselves cast into prison, under the pretence of their being spies. By their wickedness they had bereaved their father of one beloved son : now they see him in danger of losing another, who filled the place of the former in his affections, and was indeed his only temporal consolation for the loss of Joseph. They had spoken lies to their father about him : and now they are accused of falsehood by one, who, as they imagine, knows nothing of their crime. They had sent their brother into Egypt : and Egypt is the scene of their sufferings. They had cast off the fear of God in their conduct towards Joseph : and the words of this stranger, who, as they would be apt to conclude, knew not the God of Jacob, cut them to the heart ; because amidst all the severity of his conduct, he professes a strict regard to justice : for saith he, I fear God. Therefore they said one to another, we are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul when he besought us, and we would not hear : therefore is this distress come upon us *.

ONE

* Psal. xxv. 10.

† Psal. xxxi. 5.

THE holiness of God also appears with peculiar lustre and majesty in the glass of providential dispensations. When Nadab and Abihu were struck dead by fire from the Lord, Moses consoles his brother Aaron from a consideration of the Divine holiness : This is it that the Lord spake, saying, I will be sanctified in them that come nigh me, and before all the people I will be glorified : and Aaron held his peace.—

The wisdom of God also appears to greater advantage. How striking must have been the display of this perfection to Joseph, when he looked back on all the steps of the Divine procedure towards him, and on all the sinful instrumentality that men had in his sufferings, and said ; As for you, ye thought evil against me, but God meant it unto good ! By this means also he shows his people the power of his works †. Nay, he confirms their faith in his very being. A delay of judgments has often proved to his children, occasionally, a temptation to unbelief. But when the hand of God is stretched out, faith returns to its proper exercise ; so that a man shall say, when he seeth the vengeance, Verily, there is a reward for the righteous ; verily, he is a God that judgeth in the earth *.

5. THIS is also a great excitement to live closely with God. Nothing, surely, can more directly tend to endear communion with Him, than a daily unwearied observation of all dispensations, as proceeding from him as a reconciled God, a loving Father, and a compassionate Redeemer ; and an unvaried endeavour to trace his love in these dispensations. We are informed that Enoch walked with God : and certainly it is an eminent part of this acceptable exercise and exalted attainment, constantly to aim at seeing God walking with us, and, in every step of our pilgrimage, conducting us, by his good Spirit, to the land of uprightness. When one, either from faith or experience, or from the happy union of both, can appeal to the Searcher of hearts, in the words of Asaph ; Nevertheless, I am continually with thee ; thou hast holden me by my right hand ; it must have great influence in stirring him up to the study of universal holiness ; and incite him, according to the natural operations of the new creature, to express himself in such language as this ; Whom have I in heaven but thee ? and there is none upon earth that I desire besides thee †.

6. THIS practice must throw great light on the evil of sin, by discovering providential frowns and chastisements for those parts of our conduct that might otherwise appear trivial. Many of the Lord's people have, by the course of his gracious providence, been convinced of the iniquity of those practices that have formerly appeared innocent. They have seen Providence contending with them ; and being thence led to inquire into the reason of the controversy, have found it occasioned by some part of their conduct, which, till then, they reckoned void of offence. Jehoshaphat, it would seem, did not see his error in contracting so great an intimacy with Ahaziah king of Israel, who did very wickedly, till the Lord had broken his his works*. He not only reproved him by the mouth of a Prophet for this confederacy, but previouſly engaged the winds in his quarrel, by deſtroying the fleet that he had built for trading to Tarſhiſh.

* Psal. lviii. 11.

† Psal. lxxiii. 23,—25.

FINALLY, this is an eminent mean of humbling the Chriſtian. When he attends to all the providential reproofs for ſin that he meets with, or recollects all the dark, perplexed, and dangerous ſteps in his pilgrimage, through which he hath been conducted, and conſiders the caſting down which has invariably ſucceeded a lifting up; it tends greatly to abaſe him in his own apprehenſion. Thus the Lord ſpoke to his ancient people: Thou ſhalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee theſe forty years in the wilderneſs, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart. As he kept them ſo long in the wilderneſs, and led them ſo often hither and thither, for the purpoſe of humbling them; the very remembrance of their tedious courſe, and of the great variety of afflictive diſpenſations which were meaſured out to them, would, through the Divine bleſſing, be productive of the ſame happy effect. So will it be with all true Iſraelites. When they review the tenor of Providence towards them; and eſpecially when they conſider the many murmurings, accusations, and rebellions that their ſtubborn unbelieving hearts have been chargeable with under trials, they will know what was in their hearts, and thence be humbled before the omnifcient God. But they will alſo ſee, that although he hath tried them in this way, it was that he might do them good at their latter end †.

IV. WE are now to ſuggeſt ſome motives for encouraging Chriſtians to this exerciſe.

I. THE firſt thing that demands our attention is the command of God. Thus did he addreſs his Church in the wilderneſs; Only take heed to thyſelf, and keep thy

* 2 Chron. xx. 35,—37.

† Deut. viii. 2,—16.

thy soul diligently, lest thou forget the things which thine eyes have seen, and lest they depart from thy heart all the days of thy life ; but teach them thy sons, and thy sons sons.* And shall we make it a question, whether the command of God ought to have influence on our consciences? This is undoubtedly a most reasonable service ; as, by obeying this precept, we observe that course which is most intimately connected with our own comfort.

2. WE might also urge the promise, Whoso is wise and will observe, &c. The immutable God hath pledged his faithfulness for the success of this work ; Even they shall understand the loving kindness of the Lord : There is absolute certainty here ; for there is a conveyance of Divine power in the promise to all who believe it, and shew their faith by obedience. Whatever testimonies of the love of God may be afforded to others who are less attentive, there are peculiar and striking manifestations secured to those who excel in diligence ; Even they shall understand, &c. But on this topic we enlarge not, having glanced it already.

3. THE example of the faints is another excitement. Jacob did not forget the Lord's mercies towards him. He acknowledges them with gratitude, humility and wonder ; and to express his sense of their greatness and distinguishing nature, he contrasts them with his own unworthiness and with his former destitute situation ; I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies, and of all the truth which thou hast shewed unto thy servant : for with my staff I passed over this Jordan, and now I am become two bands †. When he afterwards obtained a deliverance from the rage of his brother Esau, he acknowledged it as immediately coming from God. Therefore, when he met with him in peace, he said to him, I have seen thy face as though I had seen the face of God ‡. He was sensible that in this tender meeting with his brother, wherein he found nothing but love, after he was assured that he had come

* Deut. iv. 9. † Gen. xxxii. 10. ‡ Gen. xxxiii. 10.

come out against him with an hostile intention and preparation, he had a gracious discovery of Divine love to him, and an evident seal of his reconciliation to God. He declares himself as fully persuaded of fatherly love in this merciful dispensation, as if he had received a renewed intimation of it from the mouth of God. Therefore, he speaks in language similar to that which he used, when God declared that as a prince he had power with him, and had prevailed; and as alluding to that unparalleled interview. For then he said; *I have seen God face to face: and now he says to his brother; I have seen thy face as though I had seen the face of God. Thus he was as really assured of the love of God to him, by his providential dispensation in the one case, as he had been assured of it by an immediate revelation in the other. One, careless about the operations of God, would have ascribed the kindness of Esau to some sudden change in the temper of his mind, arising from natural inconstancy; or to the mollifying influence of the valuable present which Jacob sent before him; or passed it over as one of the unaccountable accidents of life; without losing time in searching for the cause. But Jacob attributes it entirely to Divine power, restraining the wrath of his formerly implacable foe; and converting his bitter enmity into the most tender affection.—The same attentive conduct is discovered by David; I remember the days of old, I meditate on all thy works: I muse on the works of thy hands†. It was eminently exemplified in his deportment, when the Lord testified his approbation of David's design of building him an house, by informing him that he had reserved this work for his son, and declaring that he would build him a sure house.—Then went king David in, and he sat before the Lord, and he said, Who am I, O Lord God? and what is my house, that thou hast brought me hitherto‡?

4. THE consideration of God's constant and tender remembrance of you may encourage you to this exercise. Have I not graven thee, saith the Lord,

or

* Gen. xxxii. 30. † Psal. cxliiii. 5. ‡ 2 Sam. vii. 18.

on the palms of my hands? and thy walls are continually before me. He that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of mine eye. If you are in truth his people, he hath set you as a seal upon his heart, and as a seal upon his arm. He hath practically shewed you that his love was stronger than death, and his jealousy more cruel than the grave; for the many waters of affliction could not quench this love, nor could all the floods of indignation drown it. He not only remembers your persons, but all your works. For God is not unrighteous to forget your work and labour of love, which ye have shewed towards his name. There is indeed no merit on your part. You are unprofitable servants. Yet God would deem it unworthy of his essential justice, to forget this; because he hath bound himself to you by gracious promises. He is now treasuring up, in his everlasting remembrance, all those little services of love that you perform for his name's sake: and those actions, which you scarcely think worth remembering, shall be all rehearsed before assembled worlds. The book of his remembrance shall be opened, and he will in infinite love and condescension say to you; I was an hungred, and ye gave me meat, &c. Those things that you cannot remember, or are almost ashamed to acknowledge, because of their littleness and imperfection, he will not be ashamed to confess before his holy angels. The little that you speak for Christ, in commending him to others, your conversation about the affairs of his kingdom, is carefully listened to and remembered by him. The Prophet Malachi informs us that, in an evil time, they that feared the Lord spake often one to another. Well, did he disregard their exercise? No; for the Lord hearkned and heard it. The expression is doubled, to express his accurate observation of such work, the satisfaction that he hath in it, and the impossibility of its being forgotten. Your very thoughts about his name, his perfections, his glory and kingdom, are so precious in his estimation, that they are all registered in his presence. Though you

you should have no proper opportunity of expressing them to others, though they should be expressed only in feeble wishes and desires; as these proceed from love to him, they shall by no means be overlooked. For a book of remembrance was written before him for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon his name *. Even your tears are precious to him; the tears that you shed for your own sins, and for those of the world around you, that lieth in the wicked one. He keeps a cistern for them. He preserves a faithful memorial of them. Therefore saith the Psalmist, Put thou my tears into thy bottle: are they not in thy book †? And if he remembers your works, your words, your thoughts, and your very tears; can you indulge yourselves in forgetting his mercies? If he remembers your work of love, which is so very insignificant, can you forget the operation of his hand, which is one uninterrupted dispensation of love to you? If he records the words that you speak for him; can you bury in oblivion his words of grace and manifestations of mercy to you? Doth he treasure up your unworthy thoughts; and will you not account his thoughts precious? Doth he register your very tears; and will you not shed them more abundantly, when you reflect on your own unspeakable ingratitude?

5. THE recollection of former mercies will afford you an argument with God for renewed instances of his love. By rehearsing these and pleading his unchangeableness in love; you frame a most powerful argument. It was with this view that Jacob acknowledged all the mercies, and all the truth, that the Lord had shewed him; that he might have a plea for a new interposition. This is not the manner of man indeed. But as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are the Lord's ways higher than our ways. The more that a sinful worm hath run in arrears to God, the more, if possible, is he welcome to draw upon him: for nothing is so pleasing to him as to devise liberally at his hand. Therefore, Jacob infolds his petition between a declaration of former deliverance, and a promise of future good; *I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies, &c. Deliver me, I pray thee, from the hand of my brother, from the hand of Esau.—And thou saidst, I will surely do thee good. When the Psalmist had this prayer to present, Remember, Lord, the reproach of thy servants; he prefaces it in the following manner, Lord, where are thy former loving kindnessest? In the same way does the Apostle comfort himself; Who delivered us from so great a death, and doth deliver; in whom we trust that he will yet deliver †. In this manner did our great Pattern pray for deliverance from his awful desertion. He not only referred to the confidence and success of his fathers according to the flesh, who trusted in God, and were delivered; but he recounted the former evidences of a peculiar Divine care about himself; But thou art he that took me out of the womb; thou didst make me hope when I was upon my mother's breasts. And he issues all in this supplication; Be not far from me, for trouble is near §. Let us then be followers of God as dear children; for herein, undoubtedly, he hath left us an example that we should follow his steps.

* Mal. iii. 16.

† Psa. lvi. 8.

IN a word, God considers you as contemners of his operations, unless you bestow your attention on them. He concludes that you account them unworthy of your observation, and find no delight in this exercise. *The works of the Lord are great, sought out of all them that have pleasure therein.

BUT as this exercise, however comfortable and necessary, is, through the infirmity of man, liable to great abuse; we shall conclude by offering a few CAUTIONS with respect to the proper management of it.

I. BEWARE of making Providence the rule of your conduct. This would be to put it in the place of the word, which is not merely the principal, but the only rule. Sometimes, indeed, the Lord's people, when in darkness, are assisted in forming a judgment as to their their

* Gen. xxxii. 10.—12. † Psal. lxxxix. 49, 50. ‡ 2 Cor. i. 10.

§ Psal. xxii. 4.—11.  Psal. cxi. 2.

their duty, by something that occurs in the course of Providence. Perhaps, he hedges up their way with thorns, and makes a wall, so that they cannot find their paths, those which they incline to take. But merely from this to infer the sinfulness of that course, which they proposed, is to follow a dangerous line of conduct. Such motions of Providence are not to influence us, unless we perceive that the way, which seems to be pointed out, is in itself agreeable to God's revealed will, and more glorifying to him than the other. For we must remember that there is a most important distinction between the will of God as to our duty, and his will as to the event in Providence. Nothing but what is lawful is the will of God, in the first sense, as enjoined in the word. Sin itself, the greatest of evils, is his will as to providential dispensation. It is his will to permit it; else we may be assured it could never have had a being in the world. Therefore, by using the motions of Providence as a rule of duty, we may directly oppose God's revealed will, and not only plunge into enthusiasm, but provoke God by great iniquity. David's men tried to persuade him to interpret Providence in this manner. When Saul came into the cave, they said; Behold the day of which the Lord said unto thee, Behold I will deliver thine enemy into thine hand, that thou mayest do unto him as it shall seem good unto thee. But David rejected the proposal with detestation, because Saul was the Lord's anointed*.

2. JUDGE not of providential dispensations by their outward aspect. This is often very threatening, while the Lord hath nothing but love in his heart. It was Jacob's error that he judged in this manner. All these things, said he, are against me. And many of the seed of Jacob have, in their successive generations, been caught in the same snare. Were we to form any judgment of the design of such dispensations by their external appearance, it should rather be the reverse of that which would seem at first view most natural,

VOL. I.

N n n

* 1 Sam. xxiv. 4.—6.

natural. It would be nearest the truth to conclude, that those who are most severely chastised are most dear to God; and that those who enjoy the greatest share of prosperity are the objects of his aversion.—For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth. The wicked have no bands in their death, but their strength is firm. They are not in trouble as other men; neither are they plagued like other men. And in general, as is said of Lazarus, the righteous have, in this life, their evil things; while the wicked have their good things. But the Holy Spirit expressly forbids us to pretend to judge of the love or hatred of God, by the course of his Providence. Therefore, saith the Preacher; When I applied mine heart to know wisdom, and to see the business that is done upon the earth: then I beheld all the work of God, that a man cannot find out the work that is done under the sun: because though a man labour to seek it out, yet he shall not find it: yea, farther, though a wise man think to know it, yet shall he not be able to find it. For all this I considered in mine heart, even to declare all this, that the righteous, and the wise, and their works, are in the hand of God; no man knoweth either love or hatred, by all that is before them. All things come alike to all: there is one event to the righteous, and to the wicked: to the good, and to the clean, and to the unclean: to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not: as is the good, so is the sinner; and he that sweareth, as he that feareth an oath.*

3. IN all your observation of Divine Providence, still remember that the ways of God are unsearchable. His judgments are a great deep. Paul, when writing of the wonderful dispensations of Providence, in the rejection of the Jews and calling of the Gentiles, after he had said a great deal on the subject, starts back, like a man that had gone beyond his depth, crying out; O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! For who hath known the

* Eccl. viii. 17. ix. 1, 2.

the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor*? Think not that you can ever comprehend the extent of God's dispensations. There are many circumstances which far surpass your reach. For we know but parts of his ways. Often it will be equally difficult to understand their design. It is your duty, especially with respect to yourselves, humbly to endeavour to discover this. But the event will often show, how dangerous it is positively to determine. Who could have thought that the crucifixion of Christ, through weakness, was absolutely necessary to his living, as our Head, by the power of God? Often you cannot trace the chain of Providence. The connection between one link and another is not apparent. God leaves no mark of his course behind him. Therefore, saith the Church; Thy way is in the sea, and thy path in the great waters; and thy footsteps are not known †. At other times, there are such intricacies in his conduct, that our weak eye cannot follow him. Clouds and darkness are round about him. One event is, to our apprehension, so warped with another, that we cannot distinguish them. There is a wheel within a wheel: and these are high and lifted up; often so high, that they are dreadful. In a word, the reasons of providential dispensations are often very mysterious. Therefore, they must be observed with the greatest caution. Sometimes, they are the very contrary of those that would most naturally occur. The reasons of many parts of the Divine procedure shall remain unknown to the children of God, till the whole mystery of Providence be revealed in the kingdom of their Father. What they know not now, they shall know hereafter. Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord. Whatever darkness is now on his paths, then shall we see that his going forth, in every instance, hath been prepared as the morning.

4. BEWARE of forming a rash judgment with respect to God's designs. He that believeth shall not make make haste. One motion of Providence may be intimately connected with another, which is either not discernible, or at a great distance. In consequence of hasty conclusions, the children of God have often plunged into practical errors. Moses *supposed his brethren would have understood, how that God by his hand would deliver them. And thus, he, who was to deliver Israel, had to flee for his own life; because he only considered outward circumstances, without waiting for the express call of God. Jacob did not rashly judge of the event, from Joseph's dream; but he observed the saying.—Blessed is he that waiteth.

* Rom. xi. 33, 34.

† Psal. lxxvii. 19.

5. BE especially on your guard against harsh and uncharitable judgment. Many turn and twist Divine Providence, as if it were meant for a toy to their own peevish humours. It smiles or frowns, just as they feel love or dislike to their neighbour. They talk as confidently, as if they were of God's counsel. But all such daringly intrude into those things which they have not seen, vainly puffed up by their fleshly mind. If any evil befall a man, with whom perhaps they are displeased; "I foresaw this," will they vauntingly say, "I knew he could not prosper; I always expected something of this kind." Or, perhaps they will interpret the dispensation as an infallible token, that God is provoked by some secret wickedness committed by that person, and that he takes this way to reveal it. Our Lord guards his hearers against this uncharitable interpretation of Divine procedure. When some told him of the Galileans, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices; Suppose ye, said he, that these Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered such things?—or those eighteen, upon whom the tower in Siloam fell, and slew them; think ye that they were sinners, above all men that dwelt in Jerusalem? He expressly denies it; I tell you, Nay: and gives a severe check to such a spirit, by warning those, who seem to have been actuated by it, of their own danger:

* Acts vii. 25.

ger: *But except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.

BUT it may be said; "To what purpose observe the motions of Providence, or consider the operations of God's hand; if we be not permitted to form a judgment as to the reasons or intentions?" Be more assiduous in endeavouring to discover the designs of Providence with respect to yourselves, than others. Thus you will be far less in danger of forming an erroneous judgment. In judging as to others, you are apt to be misled by appearances, or by secret prejudice and the envious wish of the heart. But in judging with respect to yourselves, you are most in danger of erring on the side of partiality. Besides, here you have conscience as your assistant, which, if left to itself, will generally, in some measure, speak the truth. The children of God have also the motions of his Spirit, accompanying the word, to direct them. Some dispensations, indeed, are so distinctly written, that he who runneth may read. When there is a striking similarity between the sin and the punishment; when the wicked is evidently driven away in his wickedness; there is little danger of misinterpretation. The consciences, even of wicked men, in such cases, suggest the meaning of the Providence. But where there is no previous or present discovery of remarkable iniquity, it is presumptuous to conclude, from adverse events, that this is the reason. The friends of Job formed a false judgment in this respect. His uncommon afflictions were the sole ground on which they rested their charge of hypocrisy. Not only did Job accuse them of speaking wickedly for God; but God himself testified his great displeasure with them. He said to Eliphaz the Temanite; My wrath is kindled against thee, and against thy two friends: for ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right, as my servant Job hath. Therefore he directed them to bring a sacrifice, and to apply to Job, that he might pray for them; lest, saith he, I deal with you after your folly †.

THE

* Luke xiii. 1.—5.

† Job xlii. 7. 8.

THE Jews seem to have formed the same opinion of those who perished by the cruelty of Pilate, and by the fall of the tower of Siloam, which Job's friends did of him. They had no other evidence than this; yet they concluded that they were sinners above others. Nay, it appears to have been at that time an error common among them, to judge from the outward afflictions of individuals, that God was contending because of some atrocious sin. The disciples proposed this question to Jesus, concerning the man who was blind from his birth; Who did sin; this man, or his parents, that he was born blind?* On this account also, the Jews said to the man himself; Thou wast altogether born in sin †.

WHILE, therefore, you attend to the works of God, seek wisdom from above. Thus that which is written shall be fulfilled as to you; They shall wisely consider of his doings. Let it be more your concern to be stirred up to duty already known, and to attain further acquaintance with it, by means of providential instruction, than to indulge a vain curiosity. This improvement of Providence is represented as the fruit of a wise consideration thereof. For it immediately follows the promise recently mentioned; The righteous shall be glad in the Lord, and shall trust in him; and all the upright in heart shall glory. If you rightly observe Providence, this exercise will have the same effect in your experience, as it had in that of the Psalmist: I meditate of all thy works. I muse on the work of thy hands. I lift up my soul unto thee; my soul thirsteth after thee as a thirsty land ‡.

* John ix. 1, 2. † John ix. 34. ‡ Psal. cxliii. 5, 6.

Lately Published,

By the same AUTHOR,

In a handsome crown Octavo, price 1 s. 6 d.

T H E
S O R R O W S O F S L A V E R Y ,
A P O E M :
C O N T A I N I N G A
F A I T H F U L S T A T E M E N T O F F A C T S , R E S P E C T I N G T H E
A F R I C A N S L A V E T R A D E .

L O N D O N :

Printed for J. Murray, No. 32, Fleet-street; C. Elliot, Edin.; J. Duncan, and Dunlop and Wilson, Glasgow.

Also Lately Published, Price one Shilling,

The Second Edition of the

F O R C E O F T R U T H ;

A N A U T H E N T I C N A R R A T I V E :

By the Rev. THOMAS SCOTT,

Morning Preacher at the Lock-chapel.

Printed for Bellamy and Robarts, No. 202. Strand, London, who are also publishing by subscription, in weekly numbers, price sixpence each,

The Rev. Mr SCOTT'S FAMILY BIBLE, With entire original Notes and Practical Observations, at the end of every chapter; to be completed in 120 numbers, with an elegant plate to each, and such maps as may be necessary.

